GERMANY RESUMES ORIENTAL TRADE

BERLIN, March 22.—Germany is rapidly resuming its trade in the Far East, in spite of the fact that its islands in the Pacific were taken away by the Versailles Treaty, and business was interrupted for years by war conditions and the deportation and internment of its business men.

For the first nine months of 1922 Germany sold Japan goods valued at $6,500,000 yen. In 1913, German exports to Japan for the entire twelve months aggregated only $8,000,000 yen. The yen is worth about fifty cents.

In 1921, Germany sold China goods valued at 26,000,000 taels. An increase is anticipated in the figures for 1922 which German exporters believe will make the year's business greater than that of 1913, which was 28,500,000 taels. The tael is worth about one dollar and forty cents.

Before the war Germany had between four and five thousand citizens in China engaged in various commercial pursuits. It is estimated now that two-thirds of these are again in China, endeavoring to re-establish their business connections. German agents have been back in all the principal business centers of China for some time, including the Tsingtau concession which Japan wrested from Germany at the beginning of the great war, and which has recently been evacuated by the Japanese and turned back to China.

Germany's ambitious plans for vast territorial possessions in the Pacific, which might form the basis for great naval and commercial power, have been defeated, at least for the present, by the loss of Tsingtau, the Marshall and Caroline Islands, New Guinea and other South Sea possessions. But German steamship lines have resumed their sailings to the Orient and are making an effort to regain their lost business.

CHAPTERS FROM A WOMAN'S LIFE

By Jane Phelps

CHAPTER 78

I was at the studio when Walter finished work for the day. It was late in the fall, and already dark.

"If you don't mind being crowded I'll run you home," he said to Helen.

"Not a bit! and I do so hate the subway," she answered quickly.

"How about it, Doreen?" he asked.

"I guess we can be comfortable for that short distance," I replied. He had made up his mind to take Helen home, I knew that any objection on my part would simply annoy him without changing his purpose.

We had gone halfway toward Helen's home when we punctured a tire. We all got out, and Walter was busily at work putting on the one we always carried, when a car drew up back of us and a voice asked:

"Want any help?" And a moment afterward a rough looking man, followed by an even more unprepossessing one, came into view.

"No, thanks I'm almost through," Walter said without rising.

I looked up and down the road, but for the moment we, and those men were the only people to be seen. Unconsciously too I noticed no cars passing, for a moment something had held up that stream of traffic that in the late afternoon flows continually northward.

"Hands up!" come the order in the voice of the first man. "All three of you! Frisk the ladies first, Jim, and get their jewels."

Frozen with terror I raised my hands, dimly seeing Helen do the same. All I had read of murders and hold-ups flashed through my mind. Walter had risen at the command, had edged nearer the front of the run-about. He was trying to get his revolver which was in a pocket beside the driver's seat. Like most motorists he had a license to carry one.

"Stand still there!" the man growled at him, covering him fully, as the other one took Helen's pocket book, ordered her to take off her rings, which she did grumbling. Then he turned to me, and I also took off my rings; my diamond breach of which I was so proud. But the pin bothered me my fingers trembled so I could not seem to get it unfastened.

"Hurry up there!" the man with the revolver ordered. Just for a moment turning his eyes on me, away from Helen where she had edged closer to Walter.

"Now, Walter," I heard her say as she fairly catapulted herself upon the man, and with one quick blow knocked his pistol from his hand.

Walter sprang, but not quickly enough. The man who had been attending to me cursed, caught up the revolver, and fired. It seemed to me point blank at Walter. I screamed then everything turned black for a moment, although I heard the rumble of an engine, felt the darting car as it shot off into the darkness.

"Walter," I cried, "Did he hit you?"

"No, but Helen's hurt, Doreen. She sprang in front of me just as that brute fired."

He was stooping over her as she lay in the road. I knelt down and felt of her heart. It was beating although she did not answer when I spoke.

"Call one of those cars coming toward us, Walter. She's unconscious. We must get her to a hospital at once," my voice broke. She had perhaps saved Walter's life.

Only a few moments had elapsed since the bandits left us, but it seemed like hours. Walter stopped a large touring car, and the business men riding home in it got out, and helped Walter lift Helen into the tonneau. We left his man at the run-about, and he drove us to the nearest hospital.

Helen was still unconscious, and we waited in fear and trembling while nurses and doctors undressed her and made an examination.

"Will she die?" I asked when they finally came out to talk with us.

"Can't tell positively," the young doctor said. "She is still unconscious. That was a nasty shot. I am afraid it's her lungs."

"You go with this gentleman and get your car," I said to Walter, who had not spoke no word. I'll stay with her. She may recover consciousness." Then: "You'd better telephone her aunt of the accident. Tell her where Helen is."

"She threw herself right between me and that pistol. If she dies..." Walter bowed his head and went out.

"A help-up was it?" the doctor said. "They are getting altogether too common. You shouldn't have resisted them, they shoot if you do."

Tomorrow—Her love cost her life.

DREAMS OF SUNNY ISLES LURE MANY AMERICANS

(By Associated Press.)

HONOLULU, T. H., March 22.—The United States harbors a large number of citizens who would be kings, according to letters applying for royal jobs which have found their way to Governor Wallace R. Farrington. They come as a result of an apparently widespread misconception of the South Seas.

The applicants got busy after reading a mainland newspaper article headed "Rulers Wanted for Islands in South Seas," and the erroneous information that "details might be obtained from the American Consul at Honolulu." The deluge of letters that followed found their way, in the absence of an American Consul at Honolulu, to the American governor of the American Territory of Hawaii.

The newspaper article was part of a series entitled "Life as It Really Is in the South Seas." The first article, according to information here, began with the question: "How would you like to be the ruler of a South Sea Island?" Apparently the number of royal paraphernalia in some far-off palm-lined, tropic island is legion. The applicants included insurance salesmen, farmers, university students, oil men, cowboys, clerks and bankers. The position of king was described as not arduous, hours not long, and with continued series of "tall glasses of amber rum punch" always at the elbow of the monarch. The only disadvantage to the job was given as "the loneliness, which grows."

One applicant wrote: "Seeing recently in one of our Texas papers an article in regards to kings' jobs in the South Sea Islands, would you kindly furnish me with the information in regards to King's job in said islands? What part of the islands are men wanted, what experience is necessary, if transportation is furnished, what salary is paid, and under whom does the applicant work if awarded a position? Is it a U. S. government position, or if it is a loan concern? Any other information you can furnish will be appreciated."

Another applicant states his qualification in these words: "My dear Consul: This story appeals to the writer and if there is anything in it would be pleased to get in touch with the makers of kings. Have had lots of experience handling men and conducting business, and am sure I could learn how to make copra. If you know anything about this, put me next and the favor will be appreciated."

Governor Farrington will answer all the applicants.

GREAT BRITAIN TO DEVELOP AVIATION

LONDON, March 22.—Signs that Great Britain is planning to devote a great deal more attention to aviation, both civil and military, were to be noted during the two day's session of the Third Air Conference just ended.

Although only one resolution was passed, calling upon the government to give immediate consideration to the foundation of an air mail service throughout the Empire, there was a great deal of serious talk about flying possibilities by speakers who knew their subjects, whether technical or political. All of them emphasized the absolute necessity of England's maintaining a pace in aviation equal to that of any other nation, both from the point of view of commercial flying and the part aerial traffic will play in future military affairs.

Phrases such as "regular 12-hour passenger service between London and New York" and "large fleets of electrically directed airplanes carrying high explosives, travelling without pilots at night, perfectly silent both as to their propellers and engines, carrying death to any town on which they might descend," were used as arguments in favor of government assistance in aerial development. These arguments were advanced no less strongly by government officials than by prominent technicians and persons who might be interested in any government subsidy that may be decided upon.

There are two principal obstacles in the way of aerial development on a large scale; the government's budget is full of necessary items of no mean magnitude, and there has been considerable rivalry between the Royal Air Force and the Admiralty as to which should hold the dominant position in the development of such new schemes.

Besides, as was pointed out by Sir Samuel Hoare, Secretary of State for Air, there is the obstacle of "after-war confusion in the world." He had reference particularly to the fact that Germany is not signatory to the air convention, which has control over civil aviation in European countries, and until there are amendments to international regulations governing commercial aviation, there will be limitations to its development. These amendments are expected to be effected very shortly.

One of the main factors on the government's aviation program, as was revealed at the conference, is a plan for the training of reserve pilots and mechanicians.

Strong arguments were advanced from the point of view of economy. Commander Charles Douglas Burney, member of Parliament for Middlesex, pointed out that 15 airships could be produced for the cost of one battleship, that nine airships could do the work of 60 cruisers, thereby saving the sum of £1,000,000 pounds sterling, and that per unit mile of reconnaissance, airships would do for 25 schilling what it would take 77 pounds to do with cruisers.

FOREST PROTECTION WEEK PROCLAIMED

Efforts to save the forests of the country from fire will be commemorated during the week of April 22-28, in accordance with a proclamation issued by President Harding on March 5 and just recieved in Portland. The idea of a special week to be devoted to forest fire prevention originated here in the Pacific Northwest in 1920, and the observance has since become nation-wide. The procamation calls attention to importance of forest preservation to the industrial and commercial life of the nation and to individual welfare, and points out that fires which are the result of carelessness or thoughtlessness do great damage, seriously threatening the timber supply and dangering the cover of the watersheds of streams that are used for navigation and irrigation.

President Harding urges the governors of the various states to set the week apart and bring about its proper observance in the schools, through civic and other associations, by means of the press, and in all proper ways. In 1922 a large number of governors and mayors of many cities proclaimed the week. This is the third year that Forest Protection week has been fixed by Presidential proclamation, and its observance has been very general in the forested regions. Last year it was combined with the fiftieth anniversary of the first Arbor day.
