CHAPTERS FROM A WOMAN'S LIFE

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER 92

When I heard them rise from the dinner table, I knew I should not be allowed to remain in solitude any longer, so I arose, unlocked the door, and when Walter came in I was mending my hair tidy. I had been unable to weep, so aside from an unusual paleness there was nothing in my appearance to cause comment.

He brought me a tray daintily spread with tea and crisp toast. Rather than talk I tried to eat a little. Then, to my relief, his mother asked him to go to a motion picture with her. She was fast becoming what he called "a fan" and invariably if she saw him act as if he intended to sit down quietly at home she would ask us to go.

"Go go," I urged. "I shall lie down again, perhaps go to bed." I had arrived at no conclusion, yet the necessity for doing so weighed heavily as the moments passed. It was hard to play a part, act as if nothing had happened. I sighed with relief when the door closed after them.

I truly loved Walter and I asked myself:

"Does not true love mean sacrifice often? Does it not mean one prefers the loved one's happiness before their own? I had read of women, wives, stepping gallantly aside to make room for another whom the husband had learned to love. Were they better women than I? Did they love their husbands more? To the last I answered unequivocally, no! Of the other questions I was not so sure of my answer.

I was just a plain home and husband loving woman without any particular talents. Vashti Vernon was vivid, a beautiful flame. Beside her I was a nonesity. She was clever, scintillating, full of ardors. I had always been contented to sit back, to shine through the reflected light of my artist husband. She shone for him.

I felt a panic of helplessness. A great weariness came over me. I had tried to be a good wife, to be unselfish. I thought I understood my careless, loving husband, thought I was doing the right things to preserve our happiness, our home.

The early stages of our marriage were no different from those of many other young people in moderate circumstances. We had worked hard for success. I in the home, Walter in his studio. He had needed me then. He needed me no longer.

I heard the hall door open, his voice then his mother's. Suddenly I knew what I should do—for the present at least. The first step. The next would depend upon circumstances. It was on the knees of the gods.

"Head better, Doreen," he asked.

"Very much, Walter. I want to talk with you a little while. You know mother has been writing for me to bring Jack and make them a visit. I want to go. Your mother will object because of parting with Jack. But my mother loves him too. Father never has seen him. I want to make them a good visit, several weeks. I guess I am a little homesick." I added with a shocked sob. Then: "You are so busy at the studio you will hardly miss me."

"You don't look quite up to the mark. Perhaps it would do you good. I'll see the Maier junior no fuss. When do you want to go?"

"Right away, tomorrow. I have no preparation to make, no clothes to get. I shall quite astonish that little town with what I have."

"All right! Don't look so serious tomorrow it is!" We talked a bit more. Walter conceded he was very busy at the studio, would be for some time. Then he left me to talk with his mother.

Not one word of objection, not even had he said he would miss us. It was generous in him to make it so easy for me; yet I had longed for just a word, a sign that he would be lonely without me.

"He's too honest to pretend," I said, remembering that was a trait in him I always had admired. But it was with a heavy heart that I went to bed, to lie awake thinking, while he slept soundly.

"Isn't this decision to visit your people a sudden one?" Mrs. Page asked at breakfast.

"Yes and no," I answered. "I wouldn't go while you were away, that would have left Walter alone with the servants. But he will have your society now and I can go with a clear conscience." I had tried to be tactful, and her reply showed I had succeeded.

"I'm sure my son will not be neglected when I am with him," she said.

MAJORITY OF ENGINEERS SEND SONS TO COLLEGE

CLEVELAND, April 10.—Approximately eighty per cent of the sons of the nearly 50,000 members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and 4 Firemen attended college, according to an analysis made here by Albert P. Orth, director of the department of educational information of the brotherhood.

This information was made available through the circumstance that the department of education before which has been instituted for the purpose of advising the members of the brotherhood regarding relative advantages, facilities, cost and entrance requirements of the various colleges and universities.

The announcement continues: "Dr. David Starr Jordan once remarked: 'It is a shame to waste a thousand dollar education on a fifteen boy.' It is even more so a shame to waste a thousand dollar boy on a fifty cent college.

"Some colleges are strong in one subject and some in another. Some emphasize technology and science, and others cultures and the arts. Some colleges develop sturdy, rugged, wholesome manhood and womanhood, while others are soft and flabby. Again some colleges provide scholarships and opportunities for outside employment in order to reduce the expense of education, while others have almost become fashionable clubs for the sons and daughters of the rich.

"The department will gladly help their fellow workers to find the kind of education they want for their children."

SAHARA DESERT WAS GARDEN OF EDEN, SCIENTIST DECLARES

LONDON, April 10.—In the past there have been many guesses and speculations as to the location of the Garden of Eden. Professor Sir Arthur Keith, lecturing before the Royal Society, treated a scientific audience to some original ideas of his own on the subject.

He said that in this "far distant past" the Sahara and the vast deserts of Arabia and the area stretching to Mongolia were "blooming."

"That large tract was really the Garden of Eden, man was driven from it not by a flaming sword but by a flaming sun. Every type of man could be found round that Garden of Eden.

"It is possible to go far beyond the days of Abraham and Tubal Cain and his smithy. It should be realized that Egypt and Babylonia were only remnants of a past civilization. Civilized man, I am convinced is far older than is at present generally believed."
