U. S. POLITICAL OBSERVATIONS

By BYRON PRICE
(Chief of Bureau, The Associated Press, Washington.)

All attempts to chart the administration's probable course on labor and industrial legislation have bumped up against a barrier of presidential silence which would seem to be deliberate rather than accidental. Whatever he may be thinking personally, Mr. Roosevelt manifestly is in no hurry to disclose his program, either to congress or to his associates.

BYRON PRICE

Administration stalwarts in the senate, however, have been hurrying to the front with schemes, both old and new, to aid labor. Many of these have had Mr. Roosevelt's approval in the past and undoubtedly will again. Guffey, for the third time, will introduce a bill to maintain prices in the soft coal industry; Black will be back with his act to limit workers to a 30-hour week; O'Mahoney will have a licensing bill for all corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and Wagner will propose a huge housing program. That is only a start.

Labor leaders view the situation with more complacency than do business executives. Both in public and in private they have said confidently that they expect administration support for most of their measures. Their first problem, however, is to consolidate gains already made and to find some common ground of their own.

Factors apart from the immediate past must be considered in any thorough analysis of the reasons for Mr. Roosevelt's silence. Some months ago he called upon business for greater cooperation in reducing unemployment. Not much came of this, other than a tart exchange of ideas, and the government's relief burden remained heavy.

Since then, however, trade levels have forged steadily higher with special dividends and bonuses marking a welcome change from the skimpy fare of depression years. Thus business could not as well plead poverty when the president turned again to its leaders in mid-November and asked for a report on what should be done about wages, working conditions and unemployment.

The second request was made to the advisory council sponsored by Secretary of Commerce Daniel Roper, which is a who's who of business and finance in miniature. This time there were no sharp rejoinders. Instead the council accepted "the responsibilities placed upon us" and started to work. That augurs well for a more harmonious working out of the problems.

It also means that Mr. Roosevelt has called directly upon business for a solution. He is willing to bide his time until a reply is made. The council knows full well that its report is not the only one which will reach the president's desk. Another will come from Major George L. Berry's group, composed mainly of small business men and labor leaders, and recommendations from organized labor are inevitable.

That suggests two avenues of approach for the council, a conservative stand or one sufficiently liberal to stave off more radical proposals of other groups. A too conservative report might have a reverse effect and smother any chance for a middle-of-the-road program. The president probably will weigh one recommendation against another, and he is in a good position to bargain.

One phase of the labor program must mark time for the supreme court, for in February the justices are scheduled to hear arguments on cases involving the right of labor to collective bargaining. The president can go ahead on minimum wages and maximum hours as he sees fit. But on this he must wait.

An adverse decision might alter the entire program, even result in a constitutional amendment proposal. Mr. Roosevelt is definitely committed to the theory of collective bargaining and undoubtedly will take whatever steps are necessary. On the other hand, a favorable ruling might make further action unnecessary.

In thinking over what the year may hold for the working man, it is well to remember that labor was an important source of strength for Mr. Roosevelt in the November election. That might have a bearing upon whom he will call to his side for advice, now that the time for legislative action is here.

American ingenuity has given citizens of this country one telephone for every seven persons compared with one telephone for every thirty-five persons in the four other leading nations.

OREGON EVENTS FLASHED FROM WIRE SERVICE

3 Cops Split Reward

PORTLAND, Ore., Jan. 8.—(AP)—Three Portland policemen each will be $333 and a few odd cents richer as a result of action taken by the city council in allowing them to split the $1,000 reward offered in Indiana for the capture of William Kuhlman.

Kuhlman was taken into custody following a theatre holdup here and returned to Indiana to face murder charges.

Special action of the council was required to allow the policemen to accept the money. Donors of the reward stipulated the officers must receive it themselves or it would not be forthcoming.

Trucker Saves Life

OREGON CITY, Ore., Jan. 8.—(AP)—A passing truck driver saved the life of a caretaker at a store and service station south of Canby by awakening him while the building was in flames. No one was injured. Fire departments from Canby and Aurora saved a hotel and nearby cottages.

Money Beckons

PORTLAND, Ore., Jan. 8.—(AP)—A John Isakson apparently will be $2,193 wealthier if he can be found. Jeff Bogle asked police to locate Isakson after Bogle discovered postal savings certificates and bank books registered to Isakson while he was supervising the remodeling of Bogle's restaurant.
