TURKEY DUTY SLASH MEETS OPPOSITION

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17.—(AP)—Additional congressional opposition to the granting of tariff concessions on agricultural products from Argentina was voiced today at a hearing on a proposed trade treaty between the United States and the South American republic.

Urging no reduction be made in the tariff of ten cents a pound on turkeys, Representative Robertson (D., Va.) told the committee for reciprocity information the United States would have an immense crop of 22,000,000 of the birds this year.

Senator Byrd (D., Va.) said that while he had been an ardent supporter of the trade agreement program, he felt Argentina should not be permitted to send turkeys into this country and injure the domestic industry.

Robertson said he also had supported the trade agreement program and added, "but certainly there was no intention on the part of any one who supported this program to injure our farmers."

"Ten cent dressed Argentine turkeys could go to every market," Robertson said, "and would drive down the prices of American turkeys which must be sold promptly."

He said the Argentine turkeys were inferior but a small shipment would depress the whole market.

Representative Angell (R., Ore.) opposing the suggested treaty, criticized in particular a provision effecting turkey importations.

DRAIN HIGH SCHOOL TO SPONSOR CARNIVAL

DRAIN, Oct. 18.—Several new students have entered high school this past week bringing the enrollment up to 106.

Monday afternoon the student body was called to hear the report of the committee in charge of electing a carnival queen. The method decided upon was the collection of old shoes, each shoe to count 50 votes. After the contest all wearable shoes will be given to some welfare organization. Five queen candidates nominated from the senior class, were Florence Powell, Ada Schnider, Emma Lukens, Doris Carpenter and Miriam Witty. A large parade will be a feature the day of the carnival, Wednesday, Oct. 18.

informed her with a grin.

"Of course, that phoney job you have down at the bureau of motor vehicles doesn't hurt any, does it?"

He registered outraged dignity. "Whatayа mean—phony? I'll have you know—"

"Yes, you'll have me known you slave four hours a day—when you feel like it—which is about three days a month. Not to mention the fact that you're being subsidized by the Gammas. Keith Rhodes, you're a good egg at heart, and I'm for you from the opening whistle to the final gun, but some day you're not going to have everything handed to you on the proverbial platter. It won't be so simple then."

"But until then—" He smiled meaningly.

They swung down College Drive and passed the ivy-covered home economics building. A couple of smoothies hailed him excitedly as the car slid around the corner, and he waved back patronizingly.

"The great Keith Rhodes bestows favor upon the lesser mortals," Carol murmured.

He gave her his stock answer—the grin which was as much a part of him as his left leg.

"Pull over, Keith." They were approaching Jennings' bookstore. "There's Dan Webber. Been wondering when he'd get around to stopping at the house. Let's pick him up and take him with us."

"Oke—" And then calling to a husky young man in a maroon varsity sweater, "Hey, Webber!"

"Look up and down both ways," Carol added, as Webber waited for a stream of cars to pass.

"Don't worry," said Keith. "He will—that's just the sort of guy he is—dead serious about everything."

"Including the way he blocks for you," Carol said under her breath.

"Hi Carol! Hi Keith! Where bound?" He stumbled into the back and stretched his legs. He didn't have Rhodes' height nor the handsome features. Yet he was good-looking enough. His shoulders were broad and hinted of power—the kind of power that could blast an opposing end or tackle right into the stands.

Dan Webber could hardly remember the last time he had carried the ball for Tech. His was the blocking post and when Keith Rhodes started off on one of his celebrated offtackle slants or wide end sweeps it was Dan Webber who usually led the way.

The wind whipped tousled hair into his serious brown eyes. "Well, where we bound for?" he repeated.

Before Carol had finished explaining they were at the station. Classes wouldn't start for two days yet and students were still pouring into town by the hundreds. They strolled into the waiting room just as the 2:45 was pulling in.

Carol stripped their arms simultaneously a minute later as passengers came up the ramp. "Over there," she nodded. "And do you see what I see?"

They followed her gaze. Keith let go with a whistle. "Don't look two, kid. It's an optical illusion."

"Jeepers," said Dan softly, "call out the guard."

Walking slowly toward them, looking to either side as though she were searching for someone, was the most beautiful girl any of them had ever seen on the Tech campus. Slender, dark, her ease and grace of movement was a direct contrast with the excited, milling groups criss-crossing through the crowded station.

They walked up to her. Carol said: "I believe you're looking for me—or rather I'm looking for you. I'm Carol Reid, president of Alpha Nu—and of course you're Joan Johnson."

Joan Johnson smiled and extended her hand. "Right, and thanks for meeting me. . . ." And then as her eyes swept deliberately over Keith and Dan: "Quite a reception committee."

"Just a couple of porch lizards who infest the terrace back at the house," Carol offered banteringly. "One of them, especially. Joan, this is Keith Rhodes, and . . ."

Before she could get any further with the introductions, Keith had taken Joan's hand.

"I've heard of you, haven't I?" she murmured. "The great Keith Rhodes . . . you play football or something, don't you?"

He grinned, holding her hand a couple of seconds longer than usual. "That's right," he admitted breezily.

When Keith had released Joan's hand, Carol continued. "And this is Dan Webber . . . another varsity man."

"I'm doubly honored." She looked into Dan's rugged face, saw none of the eager challenge that had been so visible in Keith. "And what position do you play?" she inquired, almost too politely.

"Right half." He was very brief.

"Keith plays left."

"Your bags," Carol cut in. "Let's get 'em and dump 'em right in Keith's car."

"Sure." Keith said. "Let me have the claim checks."

"Thanks," Joan replied. "But I've already arranged to have them sent out to the house. I don't think it would be very convenient to pile them in a car, anyway."

Keith opened the front door for her, and got in behind the wheel. Dan and Carol climbed into the rear.
