GENERAL TRAFFIC RULES

Of making traffic rules there is no end, and yet motorists keep right on bumping into each other and pedestrians keep right on being run over. Here are some short, simple rules of a general nature, adopted by a safety council.

The first five are for pedestrians:

Never cross streets at other than regular crossing. This is "jay-walking." This reckless practice causes over half of our street accidents.

Don't cross the street directly behind a street car. There may be another on the opposite track, or an automobile you cannot see.

Before stepping from the curb see that vehicular traffic is at a standstill. "Threading" traffic is inviting injury or death.

Avoid cutting diagonally from corner to corner at street intersections. Two lines of traffic to watch doubles your risk of injury.

Always look both ways when crossing streets. The sidewalk is safe, but death lurks in the roadway.

The second five are for drivers:

Look out for children! Though playing on the sidewalk, they may suddenly run into the street.

Give the pedestrian a chance. Even if he is careless, you will deeply regret any injury he may suffer. Most automobile accidents occur when driving fast.

Accidents are always "unexpected"—therefore drive carefully at all times, using chains in slippery weather.

Keep your brakes in good order. Your life and the lives of many others depend on your ability to stop instantly.

Study traffic rules. Obey them. Ignorance is no excuse. They are written for you.

UNDERSTANDING PARENTS

In a discussion of spanking which has been raging in the "letters from readers" column of a Chicago newspaper the writers divided sharply for and against spanking. There was no happy middle ground. A juvenile court worker finally sent in a letter which might well close the subject. She said in part:

"Whether spanking is good or bad all depends. The girls who are brought here do not complain of mere spankings, but they do object to being beaten with clubs and straps. In some cases doubtless the right kind of spanking is useful, though never when the spanking father or mother is merely working off a spell of anger on the child. However, the thing that seems to be most destructive of the girls' spirit is nagging. Constant scolding while at home injures their morals more quickly, perhaps, than anything else. And probably this nagging is due to the ignorance of the parents. They do not understand their children or the changes that have been taking place in the lives and environment of children since they themselves were young." There is the solution to the punishment problem. Parents with understanding are rarely likely to know when spanking is called for or when some other form of punishment is more suitable. It takes thought as well as love to make an understanding parent, however.

Uncle Sam has had 10,000 bottles of rum when the revenue officers seized the medicinal stores of these foreign liners.

A survey shows only three cities out of 10 with enough office space. There's one thing wrong with business.

Don't worry, the slugging racket will be pulled off. Stanley Ketchel is the contrary, notwithstanding.

Failures in Wall Street don't bother the average American, as long as stocks don't fall.

Dear Folks:

Now Bill Nash, the Village poet, "I wonder why some people invent in advertising things for sale. It's sad enough of no avail. It's something if all one hears are and never makes a cents to the that advertising is an art, and that's full of foolish bunk."

"I want to know, is it not true that one peek clouds of sugar lump, I want a quart of the same jokes, and that it's advertised of course, it's cadbury and that's its name. I'm going that are safe against. When I'm a dude, I'm for love, I have right and my money goes for nice things on and not, which doesn't please my very much."

"Time flies perfect my mind. Can we see, but Pliny's talk was never done. He'd talk for hours and day with nothing or his mind to say. Call Bessie a little and Pliny too. Will interest have some lemonade, too. Tell the wind now show your hat will flow enough to stand it flat. And yet I know you will never that which is thing can never and."

"The more that WEARWELL on is on a roll, the less you pay for that's so good. Wise daily use to use SI HER shirts, you can a price that never hurts. Protective is the thing that tells you Arch Cadbury's sweet solid. And meanwhile with the bright twinkle in mischievous eyes right." Then Pliny puts his lips to flute, and all he will sing "don't it sea."

June, of course, is always the month for record "knot tying," but the clerk says that he expects more for July, because of the fact that ten of the twenty in June were issued in the last five or six days of the month.

TAPERING SLUG DAMAGES TREES

(By H. W. COONEY.)

Many orchardists are familiar with the leaf damage done to cherry and pear trees by the small tapering green slug. Every grower should realize that the leaves of a tree are its lungs, therefore, any injury to the leaves is directly reflected in the vigor of the tree.

The injury by the slug is often quite permanent and can easily be avoided by the use of lead arsenic 2 pounds to each 100 gallons of spray.

The slug is always controlled on pears by the spraying schedule for codling moth as practiced by the pear orchardists. The real damage is done to cherries and pear trees which do not have the regular schedule applied to them. For best results an application of the lead arsenic spray should be made within the next ten days.
