MOVIE COMPANY TO STAGE SCENE NEAR ROSEBURG

A group of Cottage Grove citizens and officials of the Buster Keaton movie company, now on location in Cottage Grove, visited Roseburg yesterday and in company with Tom Ness and Bert Bates, explored the South and North Umpqua rivers on both sides of the city for a spot to stage a scene. The site which will probably be used is at Winchester, about a mile below the highway bridge. The Keaton company plans to construct a railroad trestle across the river and run two old type trains across it. As the second passes over, the trestle is fired by the retreating troops of the Conferedate army and the train crashes into the river. Following the smash the Union and Confederate soldiers swarm down the banks of the river and clash in the middle of the stream where they stage a battle. About $15,000 will be expended on this one scene, one of the largest ones in the film production of "The General."

The movie company will be on location at Cottage Grove for about two more months and many local people have visited their sets and seen the company in action under the direction of the famous comedian, Buster Keaton.

CARNIVAL FILMS ATTRACT CROWDS

The armory was packed last night for the showing of the Copco film taken during the annual Strawberry Carnival in Roseburg. The pictures were very clear and scenes of the Umpqua Chiefs and Squaws, school parades, and baby parade were exceptionally fine. As a result of the movie which will be shown all over the state, Roseburg will receive a great deal of good advertising. Horace Bromley, cameraman of the California Oregon Power company, exhibited the film in this city and returned this morning to the home office in Medford.

Following the show the Chiefs staged a jitney dance with music furnished by the Oriental Gardens orchestra. A good attendance was reported for the affair.

CHAPTER 76

Confession

"I was sure that he wouldn't accept it, father."

"It is his, Gail. He should take it!"

"You don't know him, father. It will do no good to insist. Doesn't he make that plain?"

He offered me the letter.

"My dear Mr. Sherman: Yesterday I received your message. It has touched me profoundly though the credit you give so generously belongs not to me but to science. Yet I am glad and shall always rate it an honor to have been the means of effecting your recovery.

"Your sentiments are deeply appreciated but it is impossible for me to accept this astonishing sum you have enclosed. You will not press the matter. It is compensation enough for me to know that you are steadily regaining your old vigor.

"You speak of making some little return for the gift of life that has been granted you. This wish I heartily applaud for it is to men like you that science must look in this generation for aid. The money you have offered me would serve your purpose far better if given to the establishment of a research fellowship at the hospital when men working for the betterment of life are often crippled through lack of funds. I suggest this merely in answer to your implied demand.

"I am returning your check, and with it the deepest thanks for the favor of your letter and your friendship. I shall hope to hear from you again when you are completely well. Do not be in a hurry to return to work. A few weeks now will pay in the years to come.

"With best wishes to you and Mrs. Sherman, I am

"Faithfully yours,
"GRANT BENDERS."

While I read my father sat with his hands clasped, his head lowered. I spoke. He stiffened as though a shock went through him.

"That would be wonderful, father, if you should establish a fellowship."

"What!" The sharp eyes were full of pain. He leaned back, exhausted, pressing his twitching lips together. Pity moved me to comfort him.

"Will you try to make him take it?"

"I don't think I ought to, father. Truly I don't want to. I think I would scorn him if he had accepted it. No, father, I can't ask him to take it."

He closed his eyes. The strong face was a mask of gray steel.

Suddenly down the hall came the ripple of laughter. Marian, a flush staining the white face, the hair of gold falling carelessly, pushed open the door.

"Here's where you are. And I waited just on purpose to see you. See, he has pulled my hair."

"You have the baby with you?"

"Yes," she kneeled at my father's feet, rubbed her cheek against his hand. "You want to see him, don't you, father? Wouldn't you like me to bring him in?"

"If you wish."

It was consent enough for Marian. We could hear her talking gaily to mother. Then she came back, carrying the child, and sat on a low stool, twining the soft blond curls about her finger.

"See! He has grown, Gail. Can't you notice it? Look, father—that's just for you."

The baby had turned his head till the wide-open eyes rested on my father's face. Unexpectedly a radiant smile lighted the baby features, then it doubled its fists against its mouth as though the delight were too much.

"What do you think of that, Gail? He gets cuter every day, don't you, little Dal?" She bent down and kissed it, then held it to me, saying foolishly, "Kiss Auntie Gail!"

My father scarcely looked at it, but Marian held out its tiny hand for him to shake as she said good-by. So he did, but his mouth was more grim, than it had been, as though he were inwardly scourged, but would take it without flinching.

"Has she gone?" he asked.

"Yes, father."

"Close the door. Lock it and come here, Gail."

But for a long while he sat with his hand half covering his face.

"Gail," he said finally, with a breath that heaved, that reminded me fearfully of the agonized, tearing sound that had tortured him nights and days, "this means a great deal to me. You could make him take it."

"No, father. But why should it trouble you?"

"You came to me and asked me to save this man. It meant your future. I might have done it. I wish to God I had. Do you think this doesn't harass me?"

"That's not why I went to you, father. I've told you the truth. I went for the Laceys, because of all that Mrs. Lacey did for me. I didn't go to save Dr. Benders' money. You have no cause to worry at all."

His jaws clinched and he pressed his hands on the chair until the knuckles made white knobs in the skin.

"Listen to me, Gail. I have been near to death and I see a little more clearly. You know what I think of this doctor. God knows I don't want another foundling in my life. I'd like to see one of my children happy."

"I am happy, father. Dr. Benders doesn't need the money. It would make no difference to me."

"He doesn't need it, Gail? What about his research work he was to do in Europe?"

"He will succeed anyway."

"Wasn't he counting on his profits from thi soil investment to go on with the work?"

"Yes, he was."

"Now, he can't do it. What is $25,000 to me at this stage of the game, Gail? Other doctors would have charged me about half that. You can help me to square the debt with him."

"He doesn't think you owe it to him, father."

"Father,"—I sat on the stool where Marian had beeen, laid my hand on his. It was most cold. "You are nervous. You let everything trouble you. You have offered him the money and he doesn't want it. Why do you keep thinking of it?"

"You won't let me make it up to you, Gail?"

"I am not sorry for anything that has happened, father. This would not help me any."

"It would help me."

"How, father?"

"I wish it. The man saved my life."

"But he thinks a great deal of you now. He doesn't want this money. It would lower him to take it."

He snatched the hand from mine, sat up suddenly, shaking in every pulse, leaned forward till he eyes held mine.

"Lower him? Good Lord it's his!"

"I TELL YOU THIS KARNAK SURE IS REAL MEDICINE"

"Why, It Ended My Stomach Troubles and Built Me Up to Perfect Health—What More Could a Person Ask?" Says Cheney.

"I tell you, Karnak ended my stomach trouble and built me up to perfect health, so what more could a person ask," declares J. R. B. Cheney, of 4815 E. 79th St., S. E., Portland, Ore.

"For four months my stomach was upset all the time and caused me no little suffering with indigestion," continues Mr. Cheney. "Why, gas would form on my stomach so bad after eating that it kept me belching and gagging for hours. I'd have heartburn, too, and felt miserable and out of sorts all the time.

"I felt drowsy and sluggish, but when I'd go to bed I couldnt sleep, and I couldnt find anything that seemed to reach my case.

"But, believe me, this Karnak cure is real medicine. Why, I improved right along on every dose until now I'm on my third bottle and my appetite is fine, and my digestion is perfect. And all that heavy, full feeling in the pit of my stomach is gone as well as the gas and heartburn.

J. R. B. Cheney

"I just sleep now without hardly turning over, and that in itself is remarkable, for I have to sleep during the day when there is so much noise. I tell you, my entire system has been toned up and strengthened until I am like a new man, and you can just have anybody ree me about this medicine."

Karnak is sold in Roseburg by Nathan Fullerton, the Rexall store, and by all other leading druggists in Roseburg and every other town.
