Condition of Navy Generally Good

had been no slowing up in expenditures. Without increasing the navy personnel, Adams said, it is possible to man the new ships only by placing ships out of commission or cutting down allowances of those in commission.

Varied legislation will be asked of congress to prohibit making photographs, sketches or maps of military or naval defenses; for conservation of the naval petroleum and oil-shale reserves; for admitting officers' dependents, nurses and enlisted men of naval service to naval hospitals and for regulating the distribution and promotion of commissioned officers of the marine corps.

The report reviewed the navy's progress in aviation, with completion a year ahead of schedule of the one thousand airplane building program, and gave the condition of the fleet as generally good.

KEEP EYES ON EAST

WASHINGTON, Nov. 30 (AP)—While the American government seeks peace between China and Japan, the navy keeps a weather eye on the Far East.

Secretary Adams' annual report today said "it appears that China is duo for a considerable period of unrest." At Shanghai are 1,200 marines and at Peiping a legation guard of about 500 marines.

Banditry has assumed larger proportions of late in China. Reviewing operations of the Asiatic fleet, Adams said bandit activities were responsible for repeated firings on United States men-of-war and merchant vessels along the Yangtze and Siang rivers.

Although holding marines at Shanghai and described as a "continued measure of protection of American lives and interests against the hazards incident to the disturbed political conditions and resultant strife," Secretary Adams emphasized there had been no call on that unit for active combat operations during the year and that "the same cordial relations with the Chinese people and their officials have been preserved."

CURTIS WILL NOT RUN FOR SENATE POST

that Henry J. Allen, intimate of Mr. Hoover and a former senator, will be among those to seek the post.

Others Mentioned

Several outstanding Republicans have been mentioned in connection with the vice presidential nomination in 1932, including Secretary Hurley, Ambassador Dawes, and Theodore Roosevelt, governor of Porto Rico.

President Hoover, informed of Curtis' decision, said he had nothing to say at this time on the vice president's stand.

The Curtis decision caused considerable comment.

"At no time have I thought he would do otherwise," said Reed Smoot, veteran Republican from Utah and dean of the senate.

Senator McNary, Republican, Oregon, said "the announcement will meet with general approval."

Senator Moses, Republican, New Hampshire, "his announcement will serve to give much encouragement to his party."

Senator Capper, Republican, Kansas said: "I believe there will be no opposition to placing Mr. Curtis on the ticket again."

Senator Brookhart, Republican, Iowa: "I like Charlie Curtis first rate myself. I don't agree with all his conservative stuff but personally I like him very much."

Democratic comment was in a distinctly different vein. Senator Walsh, Democrat, Montana said "it is too bad to see so good a man as Vice President Curtis forced by his sense of party fealty to be a leader of a forlorn cause."

COLUMBIA RIVER IS POWER HOUSE OF THE FUTURE

900,000, and the fourth at Umatilla to cost $60,100,000, where the water would be pooled to an elevation of 330 feet above sea level. These dams, costing a total of $317,300,000, would produce 1,210,000 kilowatt hours of power at a cost of about 2 mills per kilowatt hour at the site.

In the series B proposal, four dams are suggested, those at Warrendale and Umatilla having the same specifications as in the A plan. At The Dalles a dam costing $115,900,000 is recommended. A $71,500,000 dam is called for at Arlington. This project would develop 1,200,000 kilowatt hours at about 2.04 mills per kilowatt. The total cost is estimated at $306,300,000.

The series C plan calls for three dams, one of which would be at Warrendale, to cost $64,900,000, one at The Dalles to cost $132,300,000, and the third at Arlington costing $178,100,000. This represents a total outlay of $375,300,000, the project to develop 1,515,000 kilowatt hours at a cost of 1.9 mills at the site.

The series D proposal, while representing a total outlay of many million dollars more than the others, would generate a great deal more power, and at less cost per kilowatt. This project calls for a $344,500,000 dam at The Dalles, and a $97,000,000 structure at Warrendale for an expenditure of $411,500,000. The cost would be 1.84 mills per kilowatt for the 1,690,000 kilowatt hours the plant would generate.

Three dams are provided for in the series E plans. One at Warrendale would cost $64,900,000; one at The Dalles $103,500,000, and the John Day structure $197,000,000, for a total of $365,400,000. The entire unit would produce 1,565,000 kilowatt hours at 1.86 mills.

What the reaction of congress will be to the report of the army engineers is giving the Pacific northwest no little concern. At any rate, the Oregon delegation has sent word back from Washington that unity of public sentiment on any development project submitted is the first essential.

Both Senator Steiwer and Representative Robert Butler have announced they will reintroduce a bill calling for an open river channel on the Columbia, explaining that irrespective of the power development plan preferred on the river, several years must elapse and in the meantime the channel should be opened for barge transportation.

SUNSET PASS
by Zane Grey

SYNOPSIS: Trueman Rock returns to Wagontongue after a six-year absence to find the same sleepy town he used to fight and make love and ride in—even some very well-known bullet holes still are in a wall. He expects some trouble from the sheriff, but learns that the sheriff has been slain. Since Rock left Wagontongue a new outfit, Gage Preston's, has enlarged the cattle business by introducing butchering. Ash Preston, the oldest son, is a "bad hombre" and is suspected of killing the sheriff. There is some mystery about Ash, and Rock is confidentially warned against him. Rock looks up an old friend, Sol Winter, who keeps a store, and is warmly welcomed. Winter tells Rock that his son Nick was shot off his horse, and he does not believe that it was an accident. He adds that there is some new bad blood on the range.

Chapter 2

GIRLS—PAST AND PRESENT

HERE a customer entered, and Rock was left to himself. He seated himself on the counter and put aside his sombrero, to find his brow clammy and cold.

Nick Winter dead! Shot by rustlers, or perhaps by this new bad element hinted at by Clark and Winter. The last thing Rock would have expected was that anyone could do violence to gentle, kindly crippled Nick Winter. Here was something to keep Rock around Wagontongue, if nothing else offered.

Rock groaned. "I'm sorry I ever came back to this darned Wagontongue. . . . I'll risk one more question. How about my best girl, Amy Wund?"

"Worse an' more of it, True," rejoined Winter. "After you left, Amy played fast an' loose with many a puncher. There are some who say yet she never got over your runnin' away."

"Thunder! They're crazy!" burst out Rock. "She never cared for me."

"Yes, she did, if there's anythin' in gossip. Mebbe she never found it out till you were gone. Amy was a highstrung lass. An' you know, Rock, you were sweet on Polly at the same time."

"Lord forgive me, I was."

"Boys will be boys. I reckon you didn't know your mind any better'n Amy knew hers. An' now brace yourself for a shock, True."

"Fire away."

"Amy broke the hearts of all the cowboys on the range—an' then up an' married John Dabb."

Rock glared speechlessly at his friend.

"Dabb was a widower with a daughter 'most as old as Amy. They were married a year or so ago. Amy is not happy an' she flirts as much as ever."

"Sol, will you keep my money till I come askin' for it?" queried Rock.

"Brace yourself for a shock, True," said Winter.

Rock pictured in mind the wild range south of Wagontongue and particularly the broken Sunset Pass country with its sage flats and cedar ridges and piñoned gorges and the purple timber uplands. There had never been a more beautiful wilderness known to Rock or one harder on riders, horses, and cattle.

"True, it's good to see you sittin' there," said Winter, returning. "I don't need to be told you've worked hard."

"Yes, Sol. I've been five years on a cattle job in Texas. Cleaned up ten thousand, all honest and square. How much do I owe you?"

"Owe me? Nothin'," replied Sol smiling.

"Look over your books before I hand you one," ordered Rock, fiercely. Whereupon he helped Winter find the old account, which was not small, and forced him to accept payment with interest.

"Say, Rock, to be honest, this little windfall will help a lot," declared Winter, brightly. "I got in a cattle deal some time past an' lost out pretty much in debt. Then the new store—Dabb's—ate into my trade. I had to move. Lately, my business has picked up."

"That's good. Who'd you go in cattle deals with?" rejoined Rock, gruffly.

"Dabb."

"Dabb? Not John Dabb who ran things here years ago?"

"Yes, John Dabb."

"Well, Sol, you ought to have known better."

"Sure. But it seemed such a promisin' deal, an' it was for Nick's sake. . . . But I'm out of cattle deals for good."

"What's become of my old girl, Kit Rand?" inquired Rock.

"Kit. Let me see. I know she married Chess Watkins——"

"What! That drunken loafer?" interrupted Rock.

"Yes, an' she couldn't change him, either. Kitty had to go to work in a restaurant here, an' finally they left Wagontongue."

"Good Lord! . . . How about Polly Ackers?"

"Polly went to the bad," returned Sol. "Some flash gambler got around her. She's been gone for years."

"Now, True, what're you up to?"

"I'm goin' out and get awful, terrible drunk," declared Rock, tragically. "I'm goin' to drown my grief."

"Well, wait till I come back," returned Winter. "I've got to go to the station. My clerk is off today. Keep store for me."

"All right. I'll keep store. But you rustle back here pronto."

Winter hurried out, bareheaded and in his shirt sleeves, leaving Rock sitting on the counter. He felt the wild, unreasonable yearnings to do himself wrong.

A light quick step arrested the current of Trueman's thoughts. He looked up. A girl had entered the store. His first swift sight of her caused him to slip off the counter. She looked around expectantly, and seeing Rock she hesitated, then came forward. Rock suddenly realized that to get terribly drunk was the very remotest thing that he wanted or intended to do.

"Is Mr. Winter in?" asked the girl, pausing before the counter.

"No. He had to go to the station."

"Oh—I'm sorry. I can't wait."

"Can I do anythin' for you?" inquired Rock. He was cool, easy, respectful.

"Are you the new clerk Mr. Winter was expecting?" she queried.

"Yes, miss, at your service."

"I've quite a list of things to get."

"I'll do my best. But I'm a little new to the business."

"That's all right. I'll help you," she returned, graciously. "Now where is that paper?"

The delay gave Trueman opportunity to look at her covertly. She was thoroughbred Western, about twenty-one or two, blond, with fair hair more silver than gold. She was not robust of build, yet scarcely slender. She wore a faded little blue bonnet not of the latest style.

"Here it is," she said, producing a slip of paper and looking up somewhat flushed. Her eyes were large, wide apart, gray in color. Rock looked into them. Something happened to him then that had never happened before and which could never happen again.

Something more happens to Rock, Monday, as he continues the deception.
