POET'S CORNER

The following sonnet was printed in the October number of Reflections.

STRANGE ENCHANTMENT

Across the grass the urgent shadows fall,
As night draws near on surreptitious feet;
I listen, breathless, for your low-voiced call,
And tremble as our fingers grope and meet.
The dew has gathered on the sleeping rose;
The weary linnet nestles in the vine;
Only the sighing night wind truly knows
That you are wholly and completely mine.

Then speak to me of love before we part,
And place your hungry lips against my own;
This night shall linger in my singing heart
Beyond the joy of any I have known.
Come now and claim me as the shadows spread
A veil of strange enchantment overhead.

—Marjorie Hunt Pettit.
