Much Sound Wisdom in Tagalog Proverbs

Following are proverbs of ancient repute among the Tagalog people in and around Manila: Nothing but rust destroys iron. Thorns thrust deep when the the step is swift. Though you be far behind, wit may put you ahead. A drunken man may be twitted with impunity; not so he who is awakened from sleep. Noisy waters are always shallow. Never seek fortune; if really yours it will come of itself. Even water-soaked wood will burn if left long enough in the fire. Repentance never precedes the folly. The savings of today are the comfort of tomorrow. Even a rag, put away in the closet, will turn up for good use. The really wise will always shame him who merely pretends to wisdom. A small stool made of round wood is better than a bishop's chair honeycombed with borers. When a pullet begins laying eggs, chickens may be expected. Criticize yourself before doing so to others. Be the aim never so exalted, the shaft goes no farther than the strength of the archer. He who spits at the sky gets the spray in his face. Pounding wet rice in the mortar only besmears the workman.

His Beard Too Close When Tire Blew Out

Probably the first man to devise a fluid to make automobile tires puncture proof was A. L. Dykes of St. Louis, a pioneer in the automobile industry.

The earliest automobiles had single tube tires, made by bicycle tire manufacturers and glued to the rims of the wheels. They punctured with ease and frequency. When that happened it was necessary to stop, pry off the glued tire, stick rubber bands in the hole and glue them there, put the tire back, glue it to the rim, and wait for the glue to dry.

Dyke brought out a sticky substance that could be squirted into a tire in place of air. But an Illinois physician, who wore a beard, was inspecting a tire thus filled when it blew out. He threatened to sue Dyke for the loss of his beard, for it had to be shaved off.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Historic English Ports

The Cinque ports were originally five seaport towns on the coast of Kent and Sussex, England, called in early times "the five most important havens in the kingdom." They were enfranchised by Edward the Confessor. William the Conqueror subsequently granted them the privilege of an almost independent state, under command of a warden, with a court at Dover castle. The five ports were Sandwich, Dover, Romney and Hastings. Winchelsea and Rye were added later. Up to the reign of Henry VII their chief function was the supply of the country's naval contingent. Dating from the revolution of 1688 their privileges were gradually abolished. The lord warden's jurisdiction ceased in 1835.

No Snakes in Green Isle

The biological survey says that there are no snakes native to Ireland and never have been, so far as there are authentic records. This is due to its geographic position. Isolated as it is from the region in which these vertebrates originated and which they now occupy. A few attempts have been made to introduce harmless species, but as yet its records show none established on the island. This may be due to a lack of proper environment, climate, disease or other abnormal condition. The slow-worm or lag-worm, a legless lizard which superficially looks very much like a snake, is native of Ireland, and may account for some of the snake records of that country.

Horse Racing Old Sport

Horse racing has been called the "sport of kings" because it has been one of their amusements since the earliest dawn of civilization. Thothmes I of the Eighteenth Egyptian dynasty left a papyrus letter telling of his conquest of Mesopotamia and priding himself upon the acquisition of the racing horse (the Arab), and being the first to introduce him in Africa. Somewhat later the records tell of King Solomon buying horses from Egypt and paying as much as $3,000 for some of them. Among the Greeks horse racing was introduced into the Olympic games in the thirty-third Olympiad (648 B. C).

Earned His "Tip"

Tipping was not unknown 100 years ago, one may see from the following article that appeared in a Pittsburgh paper in 1828:

"Mr. Beale received from Philadelphia on Monday last an entire load of oysters, principally in the shell. The wagoner was laden exclusively with oysters. He was 11 days only on the road and he received $100 carriage. In consequence of his expedition and his attentive and careful management Mr. Beale paid the wagoner $38 more than the amount usually received for the amount of lading."—Detroit News.

Health Hint

Loss of sleep is worse than starvation so far as its damaging effects upon the body and mind are concerned. If you keep regular hours there should be no difficulty about sleeping. If there is, find the cause before it undermines you.

Poor Helpers

At that a man would probably be about as successful buying his wife's hats as she is in choosing neckties for him.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Reason Enough

Our mints last year turned out 176,000,000 pennies. Not that a penny will buy anything, but because they have to be given in change for $1.98, etc.—Pittsburgh Gazette-Times.

Spotless Windows

Windows should be dusted daily just like furniture and washed often to allow the beneficial sun's rays to penetrate properly.
