Specialist Says Young Sows Most Efficient

A young sow is the best sow, according to J. W. Wulchet, extension specialist in animal husbandry for the Ohio State university, who recites the results of ten years of experimental tests with 1,467 brood sows to prove that after a sow reaches three years of age she rapidly loses her productive efficiency.

One and two-year-old sows raised a higher percentage of the pigs farrowed, in the experiments, than did the older brood sows. The younger porcine mothers raised 69 per cent of their pigs to weaning time, and this percentage dropped rapidly as the sows grow older, until at six and a half years the average sow raised only a few more than a third of the pigs farrowed.

Sows under four years of age produced litters averaging 210 pounds at weaning time, whereas the older sows produced litters averaging about 167 pounds.

Wulchet concluded from a study of the records that a sow should not be retained in the herd after she has farrowed a litter as a three-year-old, and that she should be considerably better than the ordinary producer if she is retained after farrowing as a two-year-old.

Post Timber

Many farmers in the Ohio valley, looking for supplies of fence posts at less cost, are asking the state agricultural colleges about the best species of trees to plant, according to the United States forest service. Farmers are showing unusual interest in preserving and developing farm woodlands to maintain supplies of lumber, fuel, and posts for farm use, and in this way keeping down the cash outlay for these materials. Among the species recommended for planting for post timber are black locust, mulberry, Osage orange, and red cedar.

Safflower Grown in U. S.

Safflower, which is grown in Egypt and India, grows best in the United States in the spring-wheat area of Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska and Montana, says the United States Department of Agriculture. Advocates of the crop believe that demand for safflower seed would result in replacing some of the wheat acreage. Safflower is not intended to replace flax but as a possible supplement to it. In normal times flax production is about half of the consumption.

High School Notes

War settles nothing and unsettles everything. To prevent war we must stop thinking war and think good will." The girls' sextet sang "Waiting in the Shadows" and "Croon, Croon." The entire assembly sang "America" and "The Star-Spangled Banner."
