STEED CLEARS UP JAPANESE ALLIANCE

navies approximately double the naval forces of the United States, would scarcely be regarded as reasonable. The idea that a tripartite Anglo-Japanese-American agreement might be substituted for the Anglo-Japanese alliance, he continues, is not popular with the American administration, and would probably never be ratified by the senate. Interpreting the reference in the Chinese memorandum to international "commitments" affecting China which ought to be examined by the conference, the writer concludes that the Anglo-Japanese alliance is one of the commitments referred to.

STEED TRIES TO EXPLAIN

In view of this campaign, which may tend to confuse American public opinion, or, if it foreshadows official action, may create a delicate situation, it seems expedient to state frankly the real position of the British empire in regard to the Anglo-Japanese alliance and thus, to obviate the impression that pressure or dictation from any foreign quarter is requisite, or that it could or would affect the decisions of the peoples of the British Empire.

There are some facts in the later history of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which, even if known to the American state department, are certainly not appreciated by the American public. One such fact is that in 1911, when Viscount (then Sir Edward) Grey was negotiating the renewal of the alliance with Baron Kato, the Japanese ambassador in London, he informed him that a clause must be inserted, removing from the possible scope of the alliance any power with which the British government might conclude a treaty of general arbitration. Baron Kato replied that he would advise his government to accept this restrictive clause. Japan, he added, knew that England would probably conclude a treaty of general arbitration with the United States, but the Japanese government had long been convinced that, alliance or no alliance, the British Empire would never, in any conceivable circumstances, fight alongside Japan against the United States.

JAPAN LOSES NOTHING

Therefore Japan would lose nothing by accepting the proposed clause.

Thus the restrictive clause was embodied in the renewed treaty. Shortly afterwards a treaty of general arbitration was negotiated between the British government and the United States. The senate, in its wisdom, declined to ratify it—a proceeding for which the British government, with all its faults, cannot be fairly held responsible. Technically therefore, the United States nullified the exclusion of the United States from the scope of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, until in September, 1914, what is known as the Bryan-Spring-Rice peace commission treaty was negotiated and duly ratified.

On his own initiative, Sir Edward Grey then informed the Japanese government, through Baron Inouye, that in the British view and for purposes of the interpretation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, the "peace commission treaty" would be equivalent to the general arbitration treaty which the United States senate had rendered inoperative.

PERHAPS NOT KNOWN

Consequently the Anglo-Japanese alliance has not contained any anti-American implication since September, 1914. Whether or not this fact was ever officially intimated to the United States I do not know. Possibly the British government, then absorbed in the conduct of the war, omitted to inform the state department. It may also have imagined that the British conviction as to the impossibility of armed hostility on the part of the British empire against the United States, which Japan shared in 1911, was sufficiently shared by the American government to render notification superfluous.

The foregoing considerations ought to dispose of any suggestions that, under the alliance, the nations of the British empire could or would be called upon to fight against the United States. But American objections to the alliance are based also upon the contention that it has emboldened Japan to make encroachments on China, and to put forward her famous 21 demands, which she would never have done had her position not been strengthened by allied relationship with Great Britain.

ALLIANCE NOT FAVORED

This contention may or may not be valid in practice. Technically it is incontestable that any Japanese action directed against the welfare and integrity of China is contrary to the letter and spirit of the alliance. But it is also true that at the recent conference of the dominion and British prime ministers at London, the majority did not favor the abrogation of the alliance, which, as interpreted by the lord chancellor, was held to renew itself automatically from year to year unless denounced.

Into this somewhat blurred situation came President Harding's invitation to the Washington conference. Though its significance was not immediately perceived in British official quarters, the consciousness of any practical scheme of Far Eastern problems gradually grew, and rendered imperative a definition of the interests and attitudes of the self-governing nations that form the British commonwealth. For the British delegation to the Washington conference I have no title or pretension to speak. What may be in their minds they alone know. But I am certain, on the strength of extensive inquiry and investigation, during recent months, that the majority of the peoples, if not the majority of the governments of the British empire, now regard a continuance of the Anglo-Japanese alliance as inexpedient.

WOULD SIDE WITH UNITED STATES

The facts of the case are very simple. If, as there is reason to hope and believe, the policy of Japan in the Far East is peaceful and direct towards cooperation with other civilized powers for the purpose of safeguarding and restoring China to her rightful position in the world, such a policy can now be carried out as well without the alliance as with it. If, on the contrary, the policy of Japan should be unwisely dominated by aggressive or militarist tendencies such as would be likely to produce conflict with the United States, it would be physically impossible for some portions of the British empire not to side against Japan. And when any portion of the British empire is compelled by considerations of its own welfare and security to take a definite stand, the whole British empire is necessarily involved.

In the one event, therefore, the Anglo-Japanese alliance is superfluous; in the other, it is worse than futile. Regard for Japan, where this situation is understood, no less than regard for British honor, demands that the alliance should be abrogated.

FAILURE WOULD MUDDLE

Unless the Washington conference achieves success it will leave the situation in the Far East and of the world generally worse than if it never had been convened. If it is to succeed in fullest measure there must be the utmost attainable clearness in the positions and policies of the powers attending it. Save in regard to the limitation of armaments—which may in theory be arranged independently of an understanding upon Pacific problems, the success of the conference will depend upon the constructive good will of the various powers toward the greatest Asiatic people, the Chinese.

The leading delegates to the conference are not without hope that Japan may prove to be as helpful in this respect as any other power. The official definition of her attitude by Admiral Baron Kato in the committee on Pacific and Far Eastern questions was therefore eagerly awaited. Satisfaction with its general tone is somewhat qualified by its suggestion that the conference can only attempt to adjust China's foreign relations, "leaving her domestic situation to be worked out by the Chinese themselves," and by the statement that Japan "would regret the undue protraction of the discussions by detailed examination of innumerable minor matters."

INFLUENCED BY JAPAN

It is unquestionable that many prominent Chinese, who would presumably take part in working out the domestic situation of their country, are subject to Japanese control. Some indication that Japan is not aiming at the perpetuation of undue influence in Chinese domestic affairs, and some more precise definition of what "innumerable minor matters" may be, would tend to remove suspicions of which the persistence might seriously detract from the usefulness of the conference.

But if the suspicion is to be dispelled in all directions, the policy of the British empire must be at least as clear as that of any other power. This it cannot be until the Anglo-Japanese alliance which, under conditions now obsolete, rendered notable services to the world at large, is relegated to the domain of history. If this is done as a spontaneous expression of British policy, the way will be open for understandings of a more general nature on which a larger system of international cooperation in the Far East could be based.

BRIAND PLEADS FOR ARMY OF FRANCE

cut down one third already and would be still further reduced.

"Tomorrow," he said, "we will have cut down to one half."

LAWS ARE PENDING

The premier pointed out that laws always were pending in the French chamber of deputies decreasing the period of compulsory military service from three years to one and one-half years.

The steps, Briand said, have already been taken by France, as an evidence of her willingness to do her utmost to realize the ideal of reduced armament.

No promises for the future other than these were made by the French premier, and he merely pointed to them as indicating France's desire to escape the accusation of being imperialistic in her military policy.

M. Briand emphasized the danger to France and to the whole of Europe from Russia.

HAS LARGE ARMY

"Russia has a numerous standing army," he exclaimed. "Who can say what will happen? A year and a half ago Russia tried to rush through Poland to Germany. We had an anxious time of it in France, but happily there was the French army, and soldiers of order, and they saved the day."

The situation is not yet settled in Russia, Briand pointed out, but, thanks to the allied armies, life and property has been protected.

"You have kept sufficient strength in your naval program here to assure your life and liberty," Briand said. "If you do what on the sea, you will surely not ignore our situation.

"You know very well that it is impossible to bring here the proof that Germany is now bringing together war materials. You might lay the keel of a capital ship, but you could not launch it without someone seeing it. But you can make machine guns secretly."

SOLDIER STILL READS

The seven millions of highly trained soldiers which made Germany the menace of the world have not returned to civil life, the French premier declared. "They are grouped together in former veterans' associations. On every anniversary, and the Germans are particularly fond of anniversary celebrations, these men get together.

"When the Upper Silesian question reached a critical stage, there were, in the winking of an eye, about 40,000 men ready on the spot with machine guns. These are facts that had been verified.

"Now, I ask the great people of the United States, whose people are so fair-minded and just, suppose there was by your side a nation which you feel is still ready morally and materially to make war upon you?

"Would you close your eyes to that danger? No, there is not one citizen who would do that. France does not exaggerate. Germany is watching and waiting."

SPEAKS FOR HOUR

The premier spoke for nearly an hour. He spoke so fast that even the fluent French speakers in the other delegations were able to follow him only with difficulty. At times he stopped in order to allow a translation of his remarks to be read.

When he finished his exhortation, he was almost exhausted and sank in his seat amid the plaudits of the throng.

When Briand finished and his remarks had been interpreted, A. J. Balfour, head of the British delegation, arose and said:

"This is not the moment to attempt a great speech," he said. "We have just heard one of the greatest of speeches. We have heard it with sympathy. We have done more than the auditors of a great artistic performance. We have heard a perfectly candid, lucid explanation of the innermost thoughts of the French prime minister.

ANXIETIES OF FRENCH

"He told us of the anxieties of the French people.

"In the secure homes of America, no terrors do or can exist comparable to those of France.

"At their very doors they have a great country, powerful still despite defeat and losses. Of course, France is in anxious doubt.

"It is of importance and of the greatest benefit for us to know what M. Briand has told us today.
