ANDREW JACKSON.

Jackson Day! On January 8th, 1815, eighty-eight years ago, the American forces under General Andrew Jackson inflicted a crushing defeat on the British at New Orleans.

It made the iron-hearted general president, of whom it may be said that he went out of office more popular than when he entered. He left his party strong, perfectly organized on a platform of low expenditures and nothing for glory or display in any form, and low taxes. For years his name remained a spell to conjure the Democratic hosts. He was vigorous, bruskque, uncouth, implacable, straightforward and open.

He crushed the incipient rebellion of South Carolina with the same mailed hand that destroyed the United States bank and held the pistol on his duellist opponent after he had drawn the fire of that adversary, then coolly and deliberately shot him through the heart. But he had reason for being implacable in that instance. The man had slandered his wife, the one creature in all the world that Jackson showed tenderness for. He was determined to take that life and gave his opponent the first shot that he might be sure of the life he hated with deadly enmity—in expiation of the offense for which there was no forgiveness.

THE PEOPLE THE FINAL ARBITER.

Governor Van Sant of Minnesota well says in his message to the legislature regarding the suits brought by the government against the combination and mergement of the northern transcontinental railroad lines, that "whatever the result there need be no apprehension, for there is a power greater than corporate wealth, greater even than the Supreme Court of the United States, and that is the power of the American people, and when once aroused no evil can resist this mighty force."

"The mills of God grind slowly,
And they grind exceeding fine;
Though with patience we stand waiting,
With exactness grinds He all."

A Chicago dispatch of January 7th says "The 100th day of the remarkable sleep of Miss Dora Meek finds her better than last week, though showing no signs of awakening. She has been silent since September 28th, sleeping soundly about eighteen hours a day and the remainder of the time sitting with her head drooping as though asleep with eyes half shut, apparently hearing nothing and seeing nothing. The young woman went to sleep during the excitement resulting from a lover's quarrel. She takes a little nourishment and is in fair physical condition. Medicine and hypnotism have failed to arouse her."

Another "oldest citizen" is dead, this time an Indian woman down in the mountains of California. The dispatch from Gridley says she was one hundred and thirty years old, and though totally blind and unable to stand upright crawled about her home and cooked her own meals. There's the difference between a man and a woman. In such a case a man would have gone to the poorhouse many years before death. Woman's nature, maybe training and education, impels her to cling to home, however humble, to the last.

That terrible bubonic plague that ran its course among the rats and their Chinese co-tenants in China some two years ago has worked its way into the several west ports of Mexico. It is still terribly fatal, though not attended with anything like the mortality when it originated in Asia. Then ninety per cent or more died. In Mexico the deaths reach about fifty per cent. Following the law of all infections diseases the plague is wearing itself out by constant transmissions.

Those champion prizefighters have altogether too high an opinion of their worth. Now here is Champion Jeffries turning up his nose at a twenty thousand-dollar purse offered for a twenty round bout betwixt him and Corbett! Great people!
