He plays middle man role in intricate 'mating game'

NEW YORK (UPI) —Boy looks for girl. Boy meets several girls, thanks to Irving Field. And boy usually falls in love with one of the girls and settles into the happy state of matrimony.

"I don't close a case without results," declared Field, who calls himself the dean of New York's marriage brokers. For 35 years, Field, a dapper little man with black moustache, has been middleman in the intricate mating game.

"This is a matrimonial agency," said Field, "not a lonely hearts club. Arranging dates as such is not my job. These people who come here have tried on their own everywhere (to meet a marriage prospect) without success. They come from all walks of life, all ages. I match up mutual backgrounds. It's got to click."

"Loneliness at some time strikes everybody," said Field, in an interview at his 42nd St. office where the decor is living room floral rather than stark office modern. A big sign on one wall proclaims, "Our service is personal and strictly confidential."

Wedding Photographs

Scattered about are wedding photographs of couples he said he'd introduced.

Field estimated he has arranged an average of 100 marriages a year and said that so far as he can determine in a quiet followup the couples have been "cemented for life. No divorces," he said.

The marriage broker, born in Poland, came to the United States as a child and developed the smoothly operating match-making business he has today by taking over from his father. He said that over 90 per cent of his "customers" are recommended by former clients, their friends and relatives. And many's the young woman for whom he's found a mate who was registered by the girl's parents without her knowledge.

Field said he interviews each prospect in depth—with casual chat at first, because many callers are nervous and often a bit embarrassed at being there. But as they grow more at ease, he begins to take notes on personality, job, salary and other financial assets, age, education, appearance and religions.

No Mixed Marriages

He said his clients these days are about evenly split among the Protestant, Catholic and Jewish religions. But he will not match-make differing religions.

"I personally don't approve of mixed marriages," he said. "And when there are children, it often is a pity for them because they don't know where they belong."

The facts on every client are cross-filed so that if, say, a bachelor in his 30's, successful, but still searching for THE one, will be introduced to eight or 10 women with a background Field feels will fill the bill. There are 7,000 names in his files, he said.

If an elderly widower would like to meet a rich widow, Field said "I check out his assets first. If HE'S affluent too, and a match then works out, it's up to the couple to arrange their riches on their own."

Fees Vary

I asked him about his fee. "It is according to the case and to the financial backing of the person involved," he said.

Field said in his opinion any happy marriage—arranged or otherwise — has these ingredients: love-respect, so interwoven that you cannot list each separately; comparable intelligence, and mutual background.

The marriage broker is wed and has one married daughter.

I asked him how he met his wife. "By arrangement," said Field. "We have been married 38 years."

Chance is seen for lightning

Special fire weather forecasts indicate a 40 per cent chance of lightning in the Deschutes woods today, and backing the forecast was a buildup of thundery clouds early in the day.

Different somewhat from the fire weather prediction was the forecast from Portland which calls for mostly fair weather in the Bend area through Thursday.

The five-day forecast calls for high temperatures in the 70s or 80s and lows 35 to 40 degrees east of the Cascades.

Bend's high yesterday was 83 degrees.
