Tax Commission Finds The News-Review Reaches Readers In The Darndest Places

The News-Review is read everywhere, judging from a report from the state Tax Commission.

The newspaper recently published a list of 139 unclaimed checks the commission office was holding for lack of a proper address.

Responses were received from such places as Seattle, Vancouver, B. C., Cloverdale and San Jose, Calif., and even West Africa, where a former Riddle school teacher had gone.

Two persons wrote they had seen the News-Review list while inmates of the state Penitentiary.

Inmates Report

One said: "I noticed in The News-Review that I had some state tax to be refunded and that the tax division wanted my address. I had been in the Salem penitentiary and had no other address than it."

The other wrote: "I was reading in the newspaper tonight where I had a refund check coming. It is my fault the check hasn't been claimed as for the past year I have been incarcerated in the State Penitentiary here in Salem."

With the assistance of the News-Review, Commission has been able to deliver 48 income tax refund checks it had previously been unable to get to persons who had given Douglas County addresses on their tax returns. This represents 35 per cent of the 139 unclaimed checks listed in the News-Review.

Using the state-wide average of $13 per unclaimed check, this means that $624 has been returned to persons who otherwise might not have received refunds to which they were entitled.

The 35 per cent for Douglas County is excellent, Tax Commission officials said, since the state-wide average at this time is approximately 17 per cent. However, since the statewide average at this time is approximately 17 per cent. However, some areas in Oregon are just now being covered in the newspaper campaign to return the tax money to its rightful owners. At present, the state total of unclaimed refunds delivered is 814 from a beginning total of 4,800.

Reasons Listed

Tax Commission officials report that changes of name and address among women who marry or become divorced, other changes of address, erroneous addresses, and postal service failure are the main reasons the refunds were not delivered in the year of issue. The list went back to the 1954 tax year.

However, in some cases the taxpayer himself was not aware that he had a check coming, the refund being the result of Tax Commission auditing, and by the time the refund was mailed, he had moved without leaving a forwarding address.

Under state law, unclaimed checks are held for seven years, after which the money goes into the state's general fund, requiring an act of the Legislature to get it back.

Largest check delivered as a result of the News-Review's list was $54.

The Cloverdale resident, formerly of Camas Valley, wrote the Tax Commission: "I never received that check. I figured that she (wife) had got it and spent it. She lives in Oregon and I live here."

The News-Review story emphasized that claimants should send in their social security numbers and some means of identification. Several claimants took no chances. They sent in not only their social security numbers but their driver's license numbers and selective service numbers as well.

Among other "means of identification" received by the Tax Commission were social security cards, selective service cards, driver's licenses, voter registration cards, fishing licenses and birth certificates.

Plane Stowaway Attempt Fails

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) — A youth who tried to ship himself by air in a box labeled canned goods has been given a suspended fine and sentence for disorderly conduct.

Fred Milbocker, 20, Lake Orion, Mich., pleaded guilty and was fined $200 and sentenced to 10 days in jail Wednesday, but Magistrate Hugh White suspended both on condition a checkup showed his previous conduct was good.

The husky young man was arrested at Anchorage International Airport Tuesday. Employes of Northern Consolidated Airlines became suspicious when a 206-pound box marked "Fragile — Canned Goods" moved.

The big carton addressed to William Miner at Dillingham, Alaska, was ripped open, and out climbed Milbocker, explaining he and Miner cooked up the scheme to save money.

He said he and Miner drove to Alaska to try to find work and ran short of money, so Miner flew to Dillingham, paying the $50 fare, and he was to fly as freight. The rate for canned goods is 10 cents a pound.

"When the box wiggled," said Ray Petersen, president of the airline, the men figured either an animal, a person or Mexican jumping beans were being shipped as canned goods."

Petersen said freight marked as canned goods normally would be stored at the bottom of the cargo hold, and Milbocker might have suffocated after other freight was pile don top of his box.

Milbocker, who said he and Miner wanted to get into commercial fishing at Dillingham, was encased in a sleeping bag and air against Miner.

Even The Chaplains Are Helping To Cut Nation's Defense Expense

WASHINGTON (AP) — Even the chaplains are pitching in to help cut Defense Department costs.

Army, Navy and Air Force chaplains of the various states have agreed to standardize certain items used in military religious services.

The aim is to trim costs by reducing the number of separate types of such items as candles, baptismal basins and altar vases.

So far, the military men of the cloth have managed to slice an original list of 159 items down to 90.

Officials said they were unable to estimate how much money had been saved in procurement but that nearly $70,000 a year would be salvaged from reduced supply record-keeping and warehousing.

The armed services once used three different sizes of baptismal basins in brass or chrome finishes. Now they have agreed on a single size in chrome.

At one time, chaplains used 12 different types of candles. These now have been reduced to 6 with prospects of a further cutdown later.

The Army and Navy both use portable altars made of aluminum with a mahogany finish. The Air Force is sticking with a natural aluminum finish but has indicated it may fall in step with the other services.

In the past, the Army, Navy and Air Force used four or five different types of altar basins. There now are only two types on the list.

The services use a single hymnal, with a separate section for men of Jewish faith.

The standardization effort began in earnest last September and has been going ahead quietly since then.

A chaplain's advisory committee meets periodically to see what more can be done in this field. It then makes recommendations to the armed forces chaplain's board.

The actual buying of religious items is handled by the Defense Supply Agency, which does much of the purchasing of common use items for all the armed services.

Washington Sets Opening Of New Priest Rapids Dam

VANTAGE, Wash. (AP) — State and federal officials assembled at Priest Rapids Dam Saturday for dedication of the $139 million project — one of two dams that will make the Grant County Public Utility District the nation's third largest producer of hydroelectric power.

Secretary of State Luther H. Hodges was the main speaker in ceremonies at Priest Rapids, here 10 generators rated at 788,500 kilowatts have been in full operation since last September.

Priest Rapids, so named because Indian religious leaders performed rites there, is 24 miles below Vantage on the Columbia. Six miles below Vantage the Grant County PUD is building Wanapum Dam, a 831,250-kilowatt project named for the Wanapum Indians.

When Wanapum is completed late in 1964, the combined output will leave only the federal government and the New York State Power Authority ahead of the PUD in hydro power production.

The PUD got a federal license for Priest Rapids in 1955 and sold a $166 million revenue bond issue to finance it.

The dam was completed ahead of schedule but legal disputes ensued.

A long grand jury investigation resulted in indictment of Frank Bell of Ephrata on charges of perjury in connection with matters concerning the project.

Merritt - Chapman and Scott of New York, the prime contractor, was fined $60,000 after pleading no contest to charges of bribery through gifts to the late Grant A. Smothers, former PUD manager. The fine was suspended on condition the company pay $50,000 toward cost of the grand jury inquiry.

And the PUD and Merritt-Chapman still are involved in lawsuits over more than $12 million in final payments.

All this was put aside as speakers at the dedication ceremonies acclaimed success of the project. The dam, more than 10,000 feet long with a head of 79 feet, has two fish ladders and provision for future navigation locks.

The PUD has sold 63.5 per cent of the power from Priest Rapids and Wanapum and retained the rest for its own use.
