MONKEYS AND DOGS.

An Odd Little Toy-Maker in New York's French Quarter.

A Queer Trade Imported from Paris—Monkeys of Many Colors and Marvelous Anatomy—Hair-Raising Improvements Upon Zoology.

A sign "Dogs and Monkeys" catches one's eye in a quiet by-street of the French quarter of New York, south of Washington square, says the New York Star. The words are painted upon each end of a little hanging show-case affixed to the cast iron balcony of the house. The show-case contains a dozen bright-colored little figures in chenille, and upon the frame is pasted a bill-head which proclaims that the proprietor is a manufacturer of Parisian novelties in chenille, wool and silk, and that his specialty is dogs and monkeys.

The manufacturer of these odd, bright little toys occupies a single small room opening on the balcony. If appearances are to be trusted the toy-maker and his wife both sleep and work in this one apartment, for in the rear is a bed and in front are the various tools and materials that are used in the trade. Neither of the pair speak English. Only a year ago they came to this country to practice their pretty art, after working at it for three years in Paris.

Chenille is a most accommodating material, for deft fingers can work it up into almost innumerable forms. It is simply a slender wire covered with a shaggy growth of wool or silk, and looking like a long and extremely fuzzy caterpillar. It is dyed into all sorts of gay colors, so that the remnants scattered about the toy-maker's floor looked like the wreck of a most gorgeous rainbow.

The toy-maker is a good-natured little man, possessed of an inordinate desire to make English-speaking persons understand his French. He struggles painfully, while his wife's black eyes widen in sympathy, and the listener looks on in hopeless mystification. Fortunately, or otherwise, the toy-maker has a friend who speaks what he is pleased to call English, the same being a grotesquely accented caricature of the language mainly current in this country. Along with this odd linguistic treasure the friend is possessed of a somewhat suspicious temperament, which leads him to use his gifts of speech sparingly in explaining the toy-maker's business.

However, between them they managed to say that the materials were imported from Paris, made up into toys right there on the premises, and sold whenever the little toy-maker could find buyers on his peddling expeditions.

Dogs and monkeys are truly the little man's specialties. He has them in all the colors of the rainbow. There are white monkeys, with blue legs and red arms; blue monkeys, with crimson arms and legs; red, white and blue dogs; white mother monkeys, clasping to their breasts tiny little red, blue and green monkeys; particolored monkeys, standing on their heads or hanging by their tails; monkeys performing all manner of gymnastic feats upon delicate wire frames; monkeys riding on dogs; monkeys drawing baby-carriages, in which repose other monkeys.

The tools of the toy-maker's trade are of the simplest sort. Besides the chenille in every imaginable color, he has gold and silver thread, tiny wires, nippers, scissors, needles and mucilage. He can make you a monkey in a wonderfully short time. It is a mere matter of a snip here, a pinch there and a twist somewhere else, and you have the monkey, grinning and lifelike. You would not believe without seeing it how much expression a single snip or pinch will put into the face of an unfinished monkey.

It is just the same with dogs. The toy-maker turns them out by the hundred. They are mostly white, and of that odd, long-haired variety which people with a fondness for improving on nature like to trim into the semblance of lions. The toy-maker turns them out singly and in groups. Sometimes he makes a four-in-hand dog team driven by a monkey. It is easy to see, though, that he is fonder of monkeys than of dogs. He has whole boxes of impish little monkeys, and it is his special delight to make up groups of half a dozen simians, big and little. When a group seems finished he will suddenly dip down into his box, fish out a particularly impossible little monkey and hook it on somewhere by a pinch at one of its wiry arms.

The little Frenchman does not pretend to have a large trade, but his bill-head is printed in two languages, and he expects to have his monkeys and dogs tremendously popular with the young folks. Meantime he picks up an odd dollar or so now and then when he goes out peddling. If only there were some such small coins in this country as the French have he would do very well, for a little monkey could be made for next to nothing and sold for half a cent, if only half cents were current.

But life in the French quarter is not expensive. There are breakfasts at 15 cents or less, and dinners at 20, and there are rivers of red wine at 50 cents a gallon. In a region like that, and swarming with children, too, a man who can make chenille monkeys that look as if they had just come out of a "zoo" or a South American forest, has no need to go hungry or thirsty.

ADVICE FOR EMPLOYES.

Principles Whose Observance Can Not Fail to Prove Beneficial.

There are certain fundamental principles of conduct which every workman should cultivate, the observance of which in the end will prove beneficial to all concerned.

Be punctual. The employer always appreciates the workman who can be depended on under all circumstances. The habit of being promptly on time when work commences can not be too highly estimated.

Work full time. Men should not be watched or driven, and yet there are many workmen who are but time-servers, and who work only when in the presence of an employer. It is your duty either to give your full time and best efforts to the interests of your employer or leave his service.

Do your best. Make it a point to serve your employer honestly, and, although you may not earn the wages paid to a brother workman, because of his superior ability or experience, do your best in the work laid out for you; you are thus fitting yourself for greater undertakings in the future.

Be ambitious. Make it a part of your duty to study and to learn from your fellow-workmen. We can all learn to do better each succeeding day; you are thus fitting yourself for greater responsibilities, and your service is daily becoming more valuable to your employer, and, as a consequence, you are daily becoming more capable of earning advanced wages.

Be studious. Let your walks, talks and reading bear the line of your trade; study its history and future; resolve to master its details and to practice them; set your mark of perfection high, and strive to reach it. Do not stop at a middle place, be first in your trade, and remember that he who is faithful to the end will receive his just reward.—Manufacturer and Builder.
