THE MODERN BARBER.

He Differs in Many Ways from the Chin-Scraper of Two Decades Ago.

This is indeed an age of progress, writes Frank Roberts in the American Tonsorial Journal, literature and art have contributed to the physical and intellectual improvement of the human race. Inventors have perfected machines which possess the hours of labor, and thus give to man more time to devote to pursuits of pleasure and to the adornment of his person. Fine clothes and jewels, however, do not improve a man's appearance if he neglects the attention of the barber. That the barber's services are being more and more appreciated is evidenced by the increased number of "tonsorial parlors," and in the improved character of the men engaged in the tonsorial profession.

Twenty years ago a barber-shop resembled a glue factory in the variety of odors which it contained, and a second-hand store in the appearance of its few articles of furniture and adornment. The barbers, too, were in harmony with their surroundings. They were, of course, of various sizes and dispositions, but they always wore long, greasy hair and dyed mustaches. They were "boozers" and chewed tobacco, and expectorated freely upon the hair-besprewed floor. They "sawed" off the whiskers and "whopped" off the hair of their customers and told rather shocking stories meanwhile. But the public had very little use for barbers in those days. Gentlemen mostly "razored" off their own stubble, and the poor "scrapers" did not earn enough to dress decently or to indulge in more refined tastes if they had them.

But now how changed the appearance of the modern barber shop and how vastly improved the condition of the barber! As fashion began to require gentlemen to patronize the barber more frequently the business became more remunerative and a better and more intelligent class of men engaged in the profession. As competition increased each barber tried to excel in workmanship and in making his shop more attractive and inviting, and now we have "tonsorial parlors" that are positively magnificent in respect to their appointments and decorations. Even the humblest barber's establishment are at least clean and cozy and have improved, luxurious chairs and better arrangements for the comfort and convenience of their patrons. The "dude" barber and the "hacker" have given way to men of genteel appearance, courteous manners and correct habits, and now, instead of being regarded as a menial, the barber has raised himself in public estimation, and his calling has been advanced to one of necessity and respectability.

—A St. Louis woman thinks that married men ought to wear rings on their fingers as the ladies do, indicating their social status. She says if they did there would not be so many wounded hearts lying around. When a gentleman approaches a lady she could readily determine whether or not he is in or out of the matrimonial market, and demean herself accordingly.
