REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER 752

HOW COUSIN AGATHA UNCONSCIOUSLY AIDED MADGE.

I went straight to my mother-in-law's room as soon as I entered the house, for I wished to make certain that I would not be disturbed while reading the note which the Japanese servant of the mysterious men next door had slipped into my hand in such stealthy fashion. I knew that to enlist her aid was the surest means of attaining my end.

She was sitting by the window looking out into the side lawn where my perennial plants, transplanted a few weeks before from the old Brennan place, were just beginning to show their first blossoms. Cousin Agatha, a book of poems in her hand, was sitting near her and evidently had been reading aloud. Cousin Agatha's reading voice is an anamoly. It is entirely different from her speaking voice, which, with its martyr-like whine, usually makes the cold chills run up and down my back. But put a book into Cousin Agatha's hand and her cadences become musical, a delight to the ear.

Neither woman looked up as I entered. It is a discourteous little custom common to both of them when a member of the immediate family or a servant comes into the room. Even Dicky is not always exempt, although both women generally show him more courtesy than they do me.

Mother Graham "Remembers."

I have found so many sterling qualities in my mother-in-law that I have ceased to remark the little custom or lack of it. But I always resent it at the hands of her cousin, for I always fancy there is something specially marked in her studious humoring of my presence until I have spoken to her.

"Do you know, Margaret, I believe your columbines and sweet peas are going to do very nearly as well as they did over at the other place," my mother-in-law remarked as I crossed the room toward her. I was feline enough to ignore the presence of Cousin Agatha to the same degree that she ignored mine.

"That's due to him," I returned, with a grateful remembrance of the way in which Katie's husband had worked over the transplanting of my favorites. "on't you remember the big balls of earth he took with each plant?"

"I remember that I directed him exactly how to do it," retorted my mother-in-law tartly, and I had hard work to repress a smile, for Jim had transplanted the perennials before we had moved our furniture, and the day he did the work was one antedating by nearly a week of my mother-in-law's return home.

But I knew better than to contradict her. She wasn't deliberately dishonest in claiming credit for directing Jim's work. But her habit of thought was distinctly arrogant, and she had been for many years the absolute dictator of her daughter's household. I knew she really believed that no delicate task either was or could be done without her assistance.

"Then I ought to thank you," I replied diplomatically, "and I shall certainly remember the process if ever I have any transplanting done again. For they are surely blooming in royal fashion.

"Out With It."

A little gratified smile twitched the corners of my mother-in-law's mouth, and I thanked my stars that a dangerous corner had been rounded safely.

But I reckoned without the quiet malice of Cousin Agatha. She gave a dry little laugh, then quickly affected to smother it. Her cousin looked up sharply.

"What are you cackling about?" she demanded.

"Nothing," Cousin Agatha remarked demurely.

"Fiddlesticks!" returned my mother-in-law. "You always mean mischief when you snicker like that. I can remember your doing it when we played dolls together. Out with it!"

"I was simply amused," Cousin Agatha drawled with seeming reluctance, although I knew that she was simply bubbling with eager malicious mischief inside, "to hear dear Margaret chime in so readily with your statement that you directed Jim how to set those plants, when I distinctly remember your looking at the bed when we first came over here and inquiring who did them and how they had been done."

She dropped her eyes to her book again, and I could cheerfully have slapped the smugness from her visage when I saw the gray paller of humiliation steal across my mother-in-law's face. The elder Mrs. Graham is one of the proudest women I know. It is her besetting sin. To be proved wrong is a tragedy to her. To realize, as she did in that moment of enlightenment, that I had been humoring her in a delusion as I would a child, must have been gall and wormwood to her.

I fairly trembled in my shoes as I stood waiting, wondering what she would do or say. I fully expected that she would include me in her resentment.

But to my surprise she turned to me with a look that touched me deeply. It held so much of loving gratitude.

"Margaret, will you let me come to your room while?" she asked. "I am very tired of this one."

Her tone was so significant that I saw her cousin wince. But she went on with her reading as if she'd noticed nothing.
