Churches Still Popular—
Because attendance at church is decreasing does not mean that interest in things religious is likewise declining, says W. C. Moseley, of Spokane, director of religious education for the northwest region of United Christian Missionary societies. Mr. Moseley says that within the past ten years church membership has increased 17,000,000, which is a 25 per cent gain. "We can be interested in religion without going to church," he says. "Churches are necessary however to help create the environment which is needed for training in proper living. Young folks are eager to relate science and religion," Mr. Moseley says and states that he sees no reason why it shouldn't be done. Environment is the important thing in training young folks, he finds. A child from a good family put in a bad environment, will not amount to much and likewise a child from a so-called "bad" family put into a good environment will become a good citizen. Mr. Moseley, who was here this morning en route east, travels in four states meeting all types and ages of people. He finds youth of today sincere and straightforward.
