PICKING UP THE TRAIL

SOME FOLKS say that fashion is fashion no matter where you find it—but I could tell them there is no place in La Grande as up-to-the-minute in modern fashions as Hill's. Pick up the trail of fashion tightness and you will find that it invariably leads to—and from—Hill's, the fashion center of La Grande.

J. Robert Dickinson of the Richmond (Va.) Palladium writes: "Sometimes when you are doting into the records . . . look up old Mister John McGraw, who has been in baseball so long that he has forgotten more about it than most of us will ever know. . . . He at one time managed the St. Louis Cardinals . . . At present he is manager of the Richmond team of the Central league (Class B) and has a team which is fighting for first place . . . No one seems to be quite sure of his age. He says he somewhere between 67 and 70. He must be around 70, however, and he has been associated with baseball for about 50 years."

And why not? Jurgen Cooke of Medford writes that John J. McGraw was only the magazine probably would be a listing of the eye-drops, or, to say: "Who cares?" Ask a veteran like Connie Mack and John Kinlow and they will tell you he was and still is one of the new judges of player talent. The general old game has gone much.

The question about John's age may not be solved immediately by the records of the best authorities differ in respect to such details but it is certain that Mr. McGraw has been a manager for a year of years. If this isn't a record in itself, we would like to know what it.

Perhaps John J. began playing baseball shortly after he took charge of the Giants (then in 1902). Since then he has managed more clubs in more leagues and more sections of the country than anyone else we can find in the baseball archives. As far back as 1900 they back-numbered him "Chinaman" because of his discovery and development of and that "Chinaman" Mathewson. Among those who have played for John J. McGraw are Christy Mathewson, Rube Marquard, Bill Terry, Mel Ott, Frankie Frisch, Ross Young, Fred Lindstrom, Travis Jackson, Bill Terry, Hughie Critz, Jimmy Ripple, Sam Rice, Dave Bancroft, Ed Roush, Bill Ryan
