New Jersey County Program Tries Neighborliness Formula

SOMERVILLE, N. J.—(AP)—A New Jersey county peopled by farmers, factory hands and millionaires is trying a formula of being neighborly to solve its problems.

"We've been growing too much apart," explains the father of the idea, advertising executive Gerard B. Meynell. "Folks just don't know one another's problems."

Understanding

If people understood each other better, he argues, there wouldn't be so many problems. There wouldn't be so many disputes either.

"And that goes for the world," he says.

The idea of a neighborliness campaign started over lunch a couple of months ago. Meynell and Sampson Smith, supervising principal of Somerville schools, decided people don't think enough about each other.

World We Want

The talk led to a meeting of 75 civic leaders. The committee quickly expanded to 800. The campaign took the theme "the world we want."

The county has wealthy estates in the northern part, booming industrial areas in the south, with broad, rich farmlands in between.

"We thought if we could get together those diverse interests, maybe there is hope for the world getting a little closer together," Maynell said.

A five-way campaign was planned:

1. Three county-wide forums, winding up June 22 with a coast to coast radio broadcast (America's Town Meeting of the Air, NBC).
2. Volunteer speakers before local civic, religious, fraternal and union groups.
3. Town meetings wherever there are local problems to 'just talk things over."
4. Open houses, with farmers entertaining factory hands and industrial plants inviting the farmers.
5. A display of historic antiques to remind folks of their historic heritage.
