iet River of Wonders Flows nderground in New Zealand

ITOMO, New Zealand—(U.P.) ee persons thread their way lly along a passageway far the surface of the earth here thern New Zealand. You are f them.

trio comes finally to the of an underground river, g silently through cavernous . There is a landing stage dim light cutting the black- for a few feet, and revealing t alongside.

ep, in please," the tall young whispers, "quietly."

are in the boat. You push into the darkness, and look rather uncertainly at the dim by the landing stage, now ing.

Noise, Please

e guide stands erect and pulls the boat upstream by a rope fastened at intervals to the walls. You can't see it, but you occasionally feel its wet strands against your face.

"Can't use the oars," the guide whispers. "No noise, please. Don't strike a light. No smoking."

The journey continues around a bend in the river, through an archway and into still another cavernous room. The only sound is the soft swish of the boat's bow parting the waters of the unseen river, and the occasional splash of water-drops from somewhere above.

You want to ask about the earthquakes which frequently shake this part of the world, and about the active volcano of Ngauruhoe above you and a few miles to the southeast. Instead, you hang on to the side of the boat and strain your eyes for a sight of something—anything.

"Stars" Come Out

You are rewarded. As the boat moves ahead, a pale glow begins to manifest itself. The sides of the cavern become faintly visible and the black surface of the river begins to reflect a sheen of light.

Then you are in the presence of a phenomenon almost past description. The cavern ceiling is alight with a soft green-white illumination as of a million stars. Some are dim, some bright as energetic little flashlights. Some turn off and on.

The twinkling effect is heightened by reflection in the ripple in the river caused by the progress of your boat. A million jewels are above and around you, the entire cavern alight with their scintillating luminescence.

This is the glow-worm grotto or Waitomo, and these are the glow-worms.

Hunt Their Prey

They are carnivorous and they are hunting their prey, the small flies that follow the course of the river in from its emergence from the outdoors a long way off.

"I'll tell you a little about them now," the guide says, "although any sound will cause a large section of them to douse their lights.

"Each worm is about an inch and a half long and is encased in a plastic-like capsule half again as long. The worm and the capsule are both glass-like and you can see through each; when I hold a light close in a moment you will see through the body of the worm to its vital organs, and will see the light in its tail.

"We don't know what causes the light, except that it is not phosphorous. It seems to be definitely electric. The worm can turn his light on or off at will and can regulate the brilliance. The hungrier he is, the brighter the light."
