Stockpile Consultant Fired, Justice Investigation Asked

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Office of Emergency Planning fired one of its consultants Friday and asked the Justice Department to look into what it called an "apparent conflict of interest violation" brought out in the Senate investigation of stockpiling.

Simultaneously Chairman Stuart Symington, D-Mo., of the investigating group said its study has brought out evidence of two instances of "clear-cut conflicts of interest," and has shown that the taxpayers face a loss of probably much more than $1 billion on the defense stockpile.

Symington said, too, that an inquiry will be made into whether companies headed by George M. Humphrey, secretary of the Treasury in the Eisenhower administration, made exorbitant profits on stockpile nickel.

The man whose contract as a consultant was canceled by the emergency planning office is John D. Morgan Jr., one-time assistant to the deputy director of the materials division of the old Office of Defense Mobilization which had over-all direction of stockpiling in the Eisenhower administration. More recently he has been a consultant, at $50 a day when actually working, to the successor agency.

The stockpiling inquiry centered Thursday on the circumstances in 1957 under which Climax Molybdenum Co. was let out of a contract to deliver about 38 million pounds of its steel alloying metal.

The government first asked for $4.5 million as a cancellation fee, figuring that as the amount of extra money the company would make by selling the molybdenum to other buyers, but finally settled for $1.2 million.

The subcommittee heard testimony that Morgan, who had resigned his ODM job less than a year before, drew $10,000 in pay from Climax as a consultant on its molybdenum contract in 1957, and in the same year drew around $3,000 in consultant fees from the government. There was no testimony linking Morgan to the cancellation.

R. C. Coburn, the committee's chief counsel, said Morgan now teaches school in Daytona Beach, Fla., and has advised the investigators it would not be convenient for him to testify until after June 15.
