RABBIT SKINS, HELD VALUELESS, NOW SOUGHT

In recent years several kinds of furs, formerly of so little value as to offer no inducement to the trapper, have been raised in price, and consequently collecting them has been made profitable. Rabbit pelts, which are extensively used by hat makers, are among these products. Formerly rabbit skins were of virtually no value at all; country boys who eagerly sought the lair of the skunk and the raccoon and who were even able to sell squirrel skins, though so little of the rabbit and made so little effort to dispose of the skins that they were seldom used except to form a pad on which they "knuckled down" in the marble game.

Now, however, rabbit skins are worth something, and the country boy who will devote this winter to saving and marketing the skins of the rabbit he kills should make a comfortable sum of money. One big Eastern firm alone has announced that it will need 10,000,000 rabbit skins during 1920, and desires so far as possible to obtain them from American sources. The skins are usually sold by the pound, which will contain seven or eight skins. During the course of the year many farm boys, and even the occasional hunter from the city, can acquire large numbers of rabbit skins, which can easily be marketed.
