The Savvy Senior

A plan by a group of wireless service providers to compile a national database of wireless phone numbers is a wrong number, according to a new study from AARP's Public Policy Institute.

Furthermore, unwanted cell phone calls are not only a nuisance, but cost consumers money.

The study, which surveyed cell phone users ages 18 and older, found that cell phone owners highly value the privacy of their wireless telephone numbers; a majority of respondents indicated that they would not want to be included in a newly created wireless phone directory.

The idea of a wireless phone directory is troubling to all consumers, but especially older consumers. Only 5 percent of cell phone users age 65+ said they would want their number to be included in a wireless phone directory. Among all cell phone users, nine out of 10 said they value phone number privacy and view the lack of a directory as a good thing.

Lou Pare, 71, of Holderness, New Hampshire, has been using his cell phone since 1995.

"I consider my cell phone number personal. I don't like the idea that it might become available to people I don't know or that I wouldn't want to have it. I'm concerned also that they might charge me a fee to keep my privacy. On top of that, I end up paying for the calls I get whether I want them or not - they eat up the minutes on my plan."

"Consumers today rely on their wireless telephones as a vital means of communication," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) "Wireless telephones enable families to stay connected, permit commerce to be conducted anywhere at any time, and provide a vital link in the event of an emergency. The legislation enables those consumers who want to be reached to be accessible, while providing privacy protections that are important to consumers."

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) added, "I thank the AARP for its support of this bipartisan legislation. I value the privacy of my wireless number. Wireless numbers should not be made available without the consent of the consumer."
