A REVOLUTIONARY SKETCH.

Refusing Washington a Drink—Story of Arnold's Treason Retold.

In the year 1780 there stood in the midst of a great farm, whose green banks sloped down to the noble Hudson, a spacious stone house. In front of the mansion ran the high road which led to the town of New York. Between this and the river and back of the house, dotting the mountain side, were the slaves' quarters, all looking the picture of neatness and comfort, for the owner of the place was not only a man of great possessions, but kind and considerate to those under him.

The family was an old and honored one, having lived in that spot for many years, noted all through the region for the valor of its men and the beauty of its women. And the present inhabitants of the mansion were no unworthy members of their race, for the father had gone to serve his country when first it called for defense, while his comely, trusting wife had not murmured at what she considered a call from duty, but ably addressed herself to the task of directing affairs in his absence. He had been ordered to the south with General Gates, and the family had heard nothing from or of him since.

But his lovely daughter, a bright girl of 19, could not bring herself to submit to the inevitable as cheerfully as did her bustling mother, and she spent many unhappy hours grieving over the suspense about her father and the separation from her lover, whom she had not seen for three years.

Early in July word had been brought of the presence of a detachment of British at Tarrytown, on the opposite shore of the river, and the news caused great anxiety. Reports of the ravages of the enemy had come to the peaceful homes by the river side, but as yet the real significance of the horrors of war had not been brought home to them. Now, however, they felt themselves to be in real danger, for the enemy were well provided with boats and it would be an easy thing for them to cross the river, while the people in the immediate vicinity of the Von Warten homestead were almost unprotected, only a few men too old for active service, some boys and the blacks being available in case of need. So all quickly busied themselves, preparing as best they could for a probable contingency.

One intensely warm afternoon in August Mme. Von Warten was nodding over her knitting by the open window, the heat and the stillness, which was only broken by the soft, even lapping of the water on the shore, being very conducive to repose, when she was rudely awakened by the hurried entrance of a little slave boy whom fright and running had combined to deprive of the power of speech for a moment.

"Speak, Tom! What has happened?" exclaimed the good lady, all her smoldering fears alive in a moment.

"Oh," gasped the boy, "three Britishers stop me in de road and ask for a drink from de well, and I tol' 'em wait and run to you!"

"Only three?" asked Mme Von Warten anxiously.

"Dat's all, missus."

"Then let them obtain their drink elsewhere, not at my well." Listening, she heard Tom deliver the defiant message in trembling tones. A laugh followed, and the men were apparently departing. Hastening to an upper window, she looked after the retreating forms and saw three American officers, evidently of high rank, one especially who sat his horse so well and had such an air of command, inducing her admiration, until suddenly the enormity of what she had done burst upon her, and in an agony of remorse and of anger against both Tom and herself she ran down to old Tom's cabin with tears in her eyes. The culprit came to meet her, wondering at the agitated manner of his usually stately mistress. "Tom, oh, Tom those were Americans, not Britishers! How could you make such a mistake!" she exclaimed looking the picture of distress. The frightened boy tried to explain that being in daily expectation of a raid from the enemy, he supposed, of course, the three men represented the foe, being too badly frightened to notice the uniform.

Soon, her daughter, accompanied by two blacks, returned from a visit to the next farm with such flushed cheeks and so excited an air that her mother knew something unusual must have occurred. "Oh, mother!" she cried as she reached the window where the good dame sat. "I have seen General Washington."

"What!" cried her mother. "Where?"

"At Mme. Van Tassel's," Annetje answered. "We were on the porch and three soldiers rode up and asked for water. We gave them some milk, which they seemed to enjoy, and the tallest one gave me back the glass with a bow and said, 'With General Washington's best thanks, my dear.'"

"Oh," interrupted her mother, "then it was to him I refused a drink."

And she told her story, to the girl's astonishment. Annetje managed to comfort her mother, who, after a time, regained her usual spirits.

On the afternoon of Oct. 2 Jacob, Annetje's lover, rode up to the Von Warten mansion, but despite the pleasure of meeting Annetje his face still wore a look of sadness as he told her of the scene he had witnessed that day—how the young Andre, brought from Tarrytown to Washington's headquarters, had been tried by court martial and sentenced to be hung as a spy; how throughout the trial his manly bearing and frank confession of the whole plan had touched every one. He was only acting under orders, but he was a spy, and the unavoidable penalty was—death. He knew it and went bravely to his end while the soldiers looked on with moist eyes, and Annetje, when she heard the story, shed a few tears as she looked up at her noble soldier boy and prayed he might be spared to her. And he was, for after the war was over there was a happy wedding and they settled down in the old stone house, where their descendants live to this day.

Middle Fork Items.

June 24, 1896.

People are going to the mountains every few days.

Mr Porter passed through here today with 200 head of cattle for Silver Lake.

School will be out Thursday, July 2nd.

Mr Larimer and Walter Goodman returned from Eugene today.

People on the Middle Fork will not kill deer; not that they are afraid of McClanahan, but the law.

Mr Jake Neet and Tom Blakely while trapping last week killed two black bears.

A party of fishermen came up the river and put their boat in forty miles above Eugene. One of the party was Mr Smith the Coburg miller. They could not catch enough fish for the fat man.

Why don't they leave John Crail's chickens alone? Why do they go into his house and take his fruit when he leaves home? Some say it is because John will not bother them, but I believe it is because the fellow that does it is a coward and a thief, and will get a load of shot if he keeps it up if some one has to shoot for John.

Mr George Wilson of Portland, is trapping with Jake Neet and Tom Blakely.

Judge Fisk passed here today on his way to Eastern Oregon.

DOCK

A sample of grain growing on Mrs Charles E Green's farm in California, from seed obtained from the Department of Agriculture shows twenty heads, each six inches in length, from a single grain. The average number of grains to each head is twenty, showing a yield of 400 fold. The conditions under which the sample was grown are exceptionally good, as it was not crowded, but even under ordinary conditions the yield from the wheat would be enormous.

from itching and burning eczemas and other skin and scalp tortures. None but parents realize how these little ones suffer. To know that a warm bath with CUTICURA SOAP, and a single application of CUTICURA (ointment), the great skin cure, will in the majority of cases afford instant relief, permit rest and sleep, and point to a speedy cure, and not to use them without a moment's delay is to fail in our duty.

Sold throughout the world. Price, CUTICURA, 50c.; SOAP, 25c.; RESOLVENT, 50c. and $1. POTTER DRUG AND CHEM. CORP., Sole Props., Boston.
