THEY REFORMED.

Some one had called her frivolous. She was just 20, and at 20 one can afford to weep bitterly in pink boudoirs.

Life seemed very gray, indeed, for about 15 minutes, and then the silver lining appeared, and with it even a faint rosy tinge which the heavenly tailor sometimes tucks into the seams of his smartest clouds.

And so she smiled.

"I am going to be sensible," she said and stuck a ferocious looking dagger through the mass of braids at the back of her head. "Sensible and serious, and I am going to improve my mind, as Aunt Van Buren used to say.

"I am going to the Astor library this very minute, and the next time Mr. Van Schaick comes to see me he will not go away and tell that horrid dowdy, Nell Denham, that I am 'a pretty little featherhead' —oh, dear! oh, dear! if he had only said it to any one else in the world, but to that girl, who still wears four-in-hand ties and big sleeves, as Noah's family did when it came out of the ark, and doesn't know this year's style of sailor hat from last year's."

And so she hied herself off to the Astor library.

* * * * * * *

Amaryllis was looking very sad when Frivole arrived. She didn't have Frivole's rose and cream complexion nor Frivole's merry laugh. But Frivole didn't appreciate her blessings that morning. The first thing she did was to begin to sob.

"Frivole, dear, what is it?"

"Oh, nothing, only I wish—I wish I could have a little wrinkle in my forehead like you, and then people would say I thought sometimes."

Amaryllis rang for tea.

"I'm so discouraged, Amaryllis," and she rolled her handkerchief into a ball and dabbed each eye.

"I want to be sensible and serious, and I don't know how. I want to be clever and improve my mind. I want to be like you!" And such a picture of appealing misery the silver teapot had scarce reflected before.

Amaryllis looked horrified.

"Mr. Van Schaick, the awfully clever one, who writes books and is a lawyer and is going to congress and all that, you know, he—well, he called once and awhile, and he said I was a f-featherhead. Oh, what a dreadful word!"

"And you wish to please this gifted creature?" said Amaryllis, dropping a lump of sugar into Frivole's tea. "Suppose you read some. Take up a course of history. Dolly Madison is a fad just now. Read up Dolly and the war of 1812. War makes good sn all talk these days, and if he is going to congress"—

"It sounds very hard," faltered the ambitious one. "But I'll try."

"That's right, dear. Now I'll confide in you. Frivole, I want to be frivolous."

"Oh, Amaryllis!"

"I'm tired of being learned. I want to know how to be attractive and pleasant when people are tired as well as when they are fresh and ready to listen and argue. I want to be like you. Now tell me how. You never weary people or task their intellects or upset their nerves. You amuse them and refresh them."

"Oh, talk nonsense and wear pretty dresses, and when the atmosphere is sad just curl your hair all over. I think you are awfully foolish though. I don't know much about anything else, but mamma always said a flirt was born a flirt, and I think you would not be half so nice if you were frivolous, Amaryllis."

So they parted.

* * * * * * *

It was fragrant and softly gloomy in the lamplighted music room, and Frivole, looking rather white and anxious, sat bolt upright on the piano stool.

All day she had been "studying literature" and "improving her mind." Kings and queens were to her as so many puppets. Paganism and civilization were mere words to play with. She was well up in literature. It was a novel position for Frivole, and when Mr. Van Schaick was ushered in he was surprised. She didn't run into the hall to meet him with some absurd welcome which he heard, misunderstood and analyzed as charming. She didn't laugh and shake her hand vigorously and then sit down with a cloud of frills around her and chatter to him.

Alas, she did nothing of the kind! He awoke her from a scene of carnage when he entered, and she raised two brilliant eyes and a flushed face from her book, advanced with intense suffering depicted on every feature, and wringing his hand said:

"Oh, Mr. Van Schaick, how glad I am to see you! Wasn't it perfectly dreadful about poor Mary, queen of Scots?"

It was very unkind of him, but Mr. Van Schaick went away to the mountains next day. He declared that his nerves were completely shaken up.

* * * * * * *

Amaryllis shook the silver tea bell angrily, and Frivole allowed two meandering tears to caress her pink cheeks.

"Well, it's a consolation, anyhow, Amaryllis, to know that you were not a success."

"Thanks," said Amaryllis.

"What did they say when you tried to be like me?"

"Well, I don't like to seem rude, Frivole, dear, but the family wouldn't listen. They simply absconded. The girls all said I had turned into 'Dodo.' You remember Dodo in the book who talked about her baby as a landed proprietor and wished she could be a Christian martyr, so that her fingers would curl up like bacon when they burned her at the stake?

"Then my laugh—you know you laugh all the time, Frivole—well, my laugh scared Bob so that he knocked over a vase which father brought from Egypt, and they all concluded that I was hysterical and had better take a vacation."

"Poor Amaryllis! I'll go with you, if my gray frock comes home."

"And what did Mr. Van Schaick say after you tried to open the conversation?"

"Say? Why, he almost fainted, and—well, I don't think he appreciates clever, cultured women. It all depends on what one is used to, I suppose."

And then they drank some more tea.—Exchange.

A Story of Stetson.

A favorite employee of the late John Stetson once found himself in the middle of a long summer without money. He approached Mr. Stetson and beseeched him for a loan of $100. "Not a cent!" snapped the manager. "G'wan away with you." The young man retreated in good order, and later in the day, having taken counsel of some friends, once more approached the man of wealth. He told him that his fiancee was on the eve of starting out with a burlesque company and simply had to have some new clothes. He wanted the $100 to give to her. "Why the deuce didn't you tell me that at first" inquired Mr. Stetson fiercely as he handed over the money. "Everybody knows you can't feed love on hay."—San Francisco Argonaut.

FACE RAW AND BLEEDING

My little boy was afflicted with Eczema in acute form for a year, during which we tried without success every known remedy. The disorder appeared on the right cheek and was of a blistery and bloody form. His pillow, mornings, would bear the bloody imprint of the side of his face, while it was impossible to prevent him from scratching his face owing to the itching. Advised to try Cuticura, I bought a box. The first application was made at night, and it is a fact, that the appearance of the affected parts showed a marked improvement the next morning, and, continuing the treatment, as a result, my child has as fair and smooth skin as can be found anywhere.

By Governor Lord.

SALEM, Nov. 9.—The annual thank-giving proclamation was today issued by Governor Lord. The proclamation in full is as follows:

"For the manifold blessings vouchsafed to us during the past year, it is fitting that we, as a grateful people, should make due acknowledgments to Almighty God. In recognition of this duty, and in conformity with the time-honored custom, and in accordance with the proclamation of the president of the United States, I William P Lord, governor of the state of Oregon, do designate and set apart Thursday, the 26th day of November, 1896, as Thanksgiving day.

"On that day I recommend that the people abstain, as far as practicable, from the occupations of every-day life, and that they assemble in their usual places of worship and offer praise and thanksgiving to God for the peace and prosperity bestowed upon us, for the health and happiness with which he has blessed us, and for our freedom from pestilence and calamities. Let us also devote the day to the enjoyment of hospitality and the strengthening of family ties; to relieving the wants of the needy and distressed, and the doing of charitable deeds; to inspiring sentiments of loyalty to our country, and respect for its laws and the maintenance of public order; to cultivating a just regard for the rights and opinions of others, and inculcating a sense of duty that will lead us to fulfill as far as lies in our power, our obligations as citizens and individuals."
