SKSB dissects test scores

State-administered tests show that the Salem-Keizer School District compares favorably with state schools as a whole in some ways, but school board members are eager to keep its students improving.

That is what board members told Superintendent Christy Perry and other district administrators Tuesday at a work session of the board. Administrators passed around charts showing how district students were progressing in different areas and breaking down test performances by groups.

Most of the charts showed percentages of students who met state standards. One for 11th-grade Smarter Balanced Assessment (SBAC) scores in 12 states across the nation in the 2014-15 school year showed Oregon first among the 12 with 69 percent of high school juniors meeting reading standards and Salem-Keizer topping that figure at 71 percent.

Where meeting mathematics standards was concerned, South Dakota came first at 39 percent and Vermont second at 37 percent, with Oregon and Connecticut tied for third at 31 percent. Only 29 percent of Salem-Keizer juniors met the math standards.

Other charts involved elementary and middle school students as well as high school students. Some broke down results by ethnic and other backgrounds. Pie charts comparing the 2005-06 school year with a total of 38,981 students in the district with the 41,464-student 2015-16 school year showed that the percentage of Hispanic students went from 26 to 40 in a decade while the percentage of white students dropped from 56 to 49.

Figures from the Oregon Department of Education for the district showed that the percentage of students living in state-defined poverty went from 40 to 58 in the 10 years, those learning English rose from 16 to 19 percent, those who had special education needs went from 12 to 16 percent and talented and gifted students declined from 10 to 7 percent.

Kelly Carlisle, assistant superintendent, pointed out that special education services are not only for students who have intellectual and learning disabilities but also for those with emotional disturbance, communication disorders, hearing impairment, autism and other health impairments.

It was noted that kindergartners' performance on the "approaches to learning" assessment was a strong predictor of their performance on the third-grade assessments.

For 2014-15, 23 schools were below the state average for English and language arts and 27 schools were below the state average for math.

For elementary schools, broken down by ethnicity, the district tended to outperform the state as a whole in English and language arts. Asian students tended to score the highest, followed in order by white, multiracial, native American, Pacific island, African American and Hispanic students.

In elementary math scores, with the state outperforming the district in most cases, the ethnic breakdown again had Asian students on top. They were followed in order by white, multiracial, native American, Hispanic, African American and Pacific island students.

In the middle schools, the state outperformed the district slightly in reading but the district was somewhat ahead in math.

Asian middle school students led in English and language arts. Next in order were white, multiracial, native American, African American, Hispanic and Pacific island students. In math, ethnicities followed the same pattern except that Hispanic students were ahead of African American students.

All high school results were for juniors. In both English and language arts scores and math scores, Asian students finished first, white second and multiracial third. Hispanic students were next, with African American and Pacific island students roughly tied.

Because the meeting was a work session, the board did not vote on anything. The next regular board meeting will be at 6 p.m. Tuesday at the Support Services Center in Salem.
