OUR BATTLE OF THE MARNE.

Americans may now say with pride that we have fought our battle of the Marne. It was small compared with hte great French stand that saved the world four years ago, but it was a battle of the same sort, fought in the same place and won with the same spirit.

The month of July will occopy a place in our history hereafter. The Germans attacked our troops for the first time with great force, on a wide front, in a renewed effort to take Paris and the channel ports. It was our big test.

Our first news was disquieting. It told of overwhelming pressure of guns and men, and of forced retreat. It was the old story, so oft repeated in this year of trials, and always disheartening. We knew that a big push may be expected to gain several miles as a matter of course before it is stopped. We were sure that the Americans would not let the Huns through. But it was a critical moment. Those troops were new. How much would they endure?

Then came the incredible news that, after yielding ground for four miles, our boys rallied and attacked the enemy with such fiery vigor that they drove him back, regaining every foot of lost ground, and sent him reeling across the Marne beyond his former lines, with the whole field strewn with his dead and wounded, and great numbers of Hun prisoners in the victors' hands. About 20,000 Huns and 400 guns were captured and the end is not yet.

We cannot expect to do as well as that every time. We must expect to lose sometimes, to retreat sometimes. But we cannot help regarding that great little battle of the Marne as typical of our army and prophetic of our future achievements.

It reminds us of the words of a British correspondent who, some weeks ago, observing the American lads at their new war game, spoke of their characteristic quality, "that fine temper which is the sword of the spirit." It is of Damascus steel, which may bend but never breaks. Yielding, it thrusts again, and wins.
