Real South American Chinchilla Will Be Raised, Worth $3500 a Pair.

A real South American Chinchilla farm will be located on the five acres opposite the A. Zweiner home at Tigard. R. C. and F. C. Bolch have purchased this land and are having a large building erected, which will be 16x50 feet long to house these animals. W. J. Carter is the carpenter and Mr. Hoskings was painting the building Monday.

R. C. and F. C. Bolch have a Chinchilla farm in southern California, but the climate is not exactly suited to raise these animals and they searched all over the coast as far north as Seattle and finally decided that the temperate climate of Oregon was the best place.

The first building, which will be followed by eleven other buildings, is built like a chicken house, one side boarded up, the other side boarded up four feet and the rest of the way left open, with wooden windows on hinges, which can be opened or closed as the weather changes. In the bottom of the building a flor is laid and then another floor four feet higher, the space between being used as their dugout to live in. The entire building will be lined inside with iron wire so that the animals cannot escape. There will be a big runway outside the building for them to exercise in.

Messrs. Bolch intend to build a winding driveway from a point at the lower part of the acreage, connecting with the highway and will gravel this road. Trees and shrubs will be planted and the place beautified. A house will be built for the caretaker. The entire place will be surrounded by a high wire fence.

R. C. Bolch left Monday morning for southern California and will return in ten days with 18 pairs of Chinchillas. The animal is small, silver gray and looks like a gray squirrel, but about the size of a rat. The pelt is approximately 8x13 inches and breed three times a year and have from two to four to a litter. A pair of Chinchillas are said to be worth $3500.

Old-Time Guilds

Waldo R. Browne's "What's What in the Labor Movement," says: "Guild or Gild. Historically, an association of craftsmen and merchants, exercising a monopoly over a particular trade or craft in a single town. Guilds of this type practically controlled the industry of medieval Europe. Roughly speaking, they were associations of producers of a particular commodity within a particular area, grouped together to protect their own interests and the interests of the consumer. They fixed prices and wages and in many cases played a prominent part in the social and political activities of their localities."

French Village Girl in Philosophic Mood

On our way to the terrace we instinctively turned back at the door of the studio. Books, books, all over! In between white marble statues looking like pale flowers in a dark forest or white-bodied nymphs under the dense foliage. Rodin remarked that the upper portion of the mantelpiece was like the front of a Renaissance palace. There was a bas-relief on its frieze and in front of it several gobelin fauteuils. The oak table was covered today with antique statues, torsos, Florentine bronze bells, quills, Renaissance candlesticks, books and manuscripts. Opposite the table Aphrodite, emerging from the dark waves of the curtain, blinded the spectator.

"I thought you would come down," the old housekeeper mumbled morosely. "Hurry up, Marie. Clean up the terrace."

"Stop!" exclaimed Rodin with feigned indignation. "Don't touch the sacred treasures of kings with your lowly broom. That one which you've already touched must have belonged to the great Darius himself."

"There's no trace left of that king," said the maid laughingly. "This thing now belongs to us. A dead king doesn't count, anyway."

"This village girl is quoting Shakespeare," said France, after having sent her away, "although it isn't likely she ever read him. Primitive souls have their own wisdom and they teach us many things." — From "Rambles With Anatole France," by Sandor Kemeri
