Britain's Young Soldiers Trained Rough for Malay

SINGAPORE. — Britain's young soldiers, training to wipe out Malaya's Communist insurgents, are learning to be combination "footpads, cat burglars and poachers."

That's how one veteran officer describes the special education in jungle warfare given in a British Army camp "somewhere in the jungles."

The 3,000 or more Communist guerrillas fighting to overthrow the British in Malaya specialize in hit and run tactics. Counterattacks, consequently, depend on split-second reaction, boldness and accuracy.

The jungle fighter must be quick and daring in close quarter combat, with or without weapons. One course at the training camp teaches everything from how to break a half-Nelson to how to disarm a sword-brandishing attacker when weaponless.

Seeing your enemy first and doing something about it before he does saves lives in the jungle. Training on a jungle range is designed specifically to develop a senstive eye for hidden enemies and cunning booby traps.

"We have to teach them to look through the jungle instead of at it," explained the range instructor.

Most recent factor for modifying synthetic rubbers is a lower processing temperature. Improved synthetic is being made by the "cold" process because a lower temperature of polymerization produces molecules of better size and shape.
