Soldier Loses Arm, but---

John J. Murray was a stake driver at $18 per week before the World War. He lost an arm in the Argonne. Rehabilitated through the American Legion he was sent to Boston University, and now he has been made a professor there in Business administration.

World War Veteran Studies Business Course So Well That Boston University Makes Him A Professor.

By Robert Fuller

Boston, April 9.—John Murray now an instructor in Boston University here ,who, quitting an $18 a week job driving stakes, went into the World War and lost an arm in the Argonne, has written an appeal to remember those still suffering the pains of the great conflict.

"I supporse it is just human nature to forget," he says.

Murray has won a bachelor's and a master's degree in the last year. Boston University had planned to make a salesman of him, but his work in economics attracted attention to such an unusual degree that the university decided it did not wish to lose him. He knows what it means to really and literally fight for an education, and his letter, sent to national headquarters of the American Legion in Indianapolis, is a plea in support of the American Legion Endowment Fund for disabled men and orphans of veterans.

"My observation and my knowledge of the Legion's acts of kindness and help to many prove to me the justification for its existance," he says.

Murray had been working as a transit man, swinging a hammer and carrying a surveyor's chair for a civil engineer, early in 1917. He believed he could begin a college course the next fall. Then war. Murray quickly decided he could not stay on the sidelines.

Gassed and Lases Arm in Argonne

He went to France with the 111th Infantry of the 28th division. At Manblainville in the Argonne he was gassed and his left forearm so badly shattered it had to be amputated. Most of his savings had disappeared. Like most everyone else in uniform, he had hardly expected that he would be living when the war ended. Besides the dollar's value had shrunken. Murray could not return to his old work, andb the cost of everything, including education, had risen.

However, the government agencies were making that heartrending beginning of the effort to give all men disabled in war service a fair deal. The government acknowledged that a man who had given an arm for his country was entitled to an education at the country's cost. So Murray was enrolled in the College of Business Administration of Boston University. He now has completed the courses at the age of 28 and has been made a professor. On the threshold of newer and wider ambitions, he writes:

"Certainly if it were not for The American Legion, many of us, myself included, would have no reason to be other than bitterly disposed towards everything, despondent and unhappy.
