LITERARY SUCCESS.

The Anglo-Saxon Race Demands Absolute

There was a discussion at the Authors' Club the other night on that everen-thralling topic: "The Power of the Young Person in Anglo-Saxon Liter-ature," and the usual outburst on the part of the malcontents about the queer prudery of the laws that govern Englsh liction, permitting free use of battle, murder and sudden death, of ruptures of all the commandments save one, and the stern prohibition of any reference to the seventh command, though it dealt with a force that produced more dramatic episodes than all the rest of the passions put together. There was the usual scornful talk about puritanism and prurient prudery. One hot-headed young man declared that he would not chafe against the restrictions were the prudery of the laws that govern English hafe against the restrictions were the Anglo-Saxons in deed as well as word a more moral people than the French or the Russians but that he denied that they were. An olderman, who had been all through the period of kicking against the pricks and of final submission, insisted that Anglo-Saxon literature had not suffered because of its limitations, and on the whole was stronger and betthan the French. "A publisher here in New York," he declared, "showed me his books the other day to praye to me that books the other day to prove to me that the greater part of his fortune of somehing like $2,000,000 had been made by he sale of sets of Dickens' works at $14, Whatever statistics you may get from librarians, he said to me, 'never believe but that Dickens' novels sell better than hoss of any man that ever lived, and totay sell better than the novels of the nost successful pathor alive.' And," ontinued the speaker, "you can draw a lady's cambric handkerenief through every page Dickens ever penned, and it will come out without a smirch upon it.

This was followed by many other instances, which went to prove that the Anglo-Saxon absolutely demanded a clean literature in fletion, and also that he lost very little by it. Thackeray cried out against the restraint sometimes, int no one feels that his acceptance. but no one feels that his novels are the worse for it. Stevenson rails in private at times, but he manages to create the the strongest stories by any living au-thor of to-day while ignoring the passion of love almost aitogether. Among other proofs of the sort was advanced the success of Robert Bonner who has made millions out of a perfectly clean family story paper. A friend of his told about Bonner's touchstone, which he applied to all literature submitted to him, and through the accuracy and efficacy of which he has made his fortune. "When I began The Ledger," said Bonner to his friend one day. "I imagined an old lady up in Westenester County who has three daughters, one twenty, one fifteen and the other twelve. Then I saw them come home from prayer-meeting about 9:30 Wednesday evening, and, not being to those since I had always tested it by the old lady in Westchester, and if she thought she could read it to the girls she thought she could read it to I usually accepted it; otherwise it was returned promptly to the author." The authors agreed that the success of The Century has been due to just such tac-ties. And they also agreed that, though certain erotic writers might have fle ing success, to achieve lasting popularity in this century's fiction it is necessary to ignore as far as possible any reference to a certain subject. - Brooklyr

Passing over private servants, such as scullery maids, washerwomen, pages, footmen, grooms and coachmen, come to two public servants, who surely are most useful. The first is the dientsmann. He is to be found in red cap and blue blouse standing at the street corner and waiting for patronage. Do you want a package sent or called for, do you want some one to gather up your bundles in shopping as you go along, do you want to send a bouquet, a card, a message, here is your man. He gives you a receipt with his number, so that in case there is any fault-finding, the chief bureau can be consulted, and the mistake, if possible, will be rectified.

In the country, the botenfrau answers to much the same demands. Early in the morning she presents herself at the different country houses in her section. and then, armed with commissions of all 6 00 sorts, trudges off to the market town, returning later in the day with a huge basket on her back. The very national Teutonic trait of dependence on something, be it family, university, army, throne or what-not, as opposed to our higher notion of com-plete independence, makes of the German servants a better article, so to speak, than were they allowed too much liberty, along with many illusive and delusive dreams of speedy emancipation. True, when long serving some one fam-ily and this especially in the country, 1646 18; they become an integral part of that family, as perhaps nowhere else save in England. It is rarely, however, even in the sight of father and son, mother 5 and daughter in the same service, or 51 rather, one family adapting itself to the wants of another and always expecting to continue in that service, that one sees a spirit of real discontent. While 15 00 a 16 00 we may well congratulate ourselves that in free America there is a far greater chance for a man to rise in the social scale. In wealth, in reputation than here, one may not fail to give the German servant his just due. He looks upon Per M. $10 00 his service, not as in any way a degrad ing thing, but as an bonorable calling:
