Red China Report

Reliable Communists connected with Chinese foreign relations consequently told me that China's sectarian leaders deeply distrust Khrushchev. For them he is an unworthy successor to Stalin's throne, a waverer who toys with democracy at home and is not firm in his policies abroad. "These people are always blundering," a Peiping Communist told me loftily. "The Russians mishandled the Belgrade deviation by primarily attacking Yugoslavia as an enemy state instead of the 'contradictions' in Yugoslav ideological thinking. Yet it is the unity of Marxist thought, not the union of Socialist States which is our strength. Weak Soviet policy was also responsible for the Hungarian revolution and for the trouble in Poland. These people never seem to grasp that, first and foremost, it is men's minds that you must change."

From great heights, China, preoccupied with her ideological and economic revolution, is ready to instruct a Soviet Union that started more than 30 years arlier, that has passed through the Stalin era and come out the other side, and that is now immersed in the problems of interstate relations. Private Russian comment on the Chinese and their conceits is often quite unprintable.

But while Moscow may be impatient of China's ambition to persuade the Socialist world to conform to her ideas and needs, China is not only a fabulous material and strategic asset to the Soviet bloc, but an example that all Asia may be persuaded to follow.

China, on her side, is so obsessed by the necessity for Soviet solidarity that Peiping would never risk an open breach. Behind the flowery expressions of friendship lies a firm business partnership, for before China can kick Russia down she must first climb to supremacy on Russia's shoulders.

The most stabilizing factor in Sino-Soviet relations today is Peiping's dependence on the Soviet Union. It is still the USSR which provides the foundation and scaffolding for her reconstruction.

The Soviet Union is supplying the blueprints, technicians and most of the machines for 211 major industrial enterprises now being completed in China. Moscow has advanced loans at interest rates of from 1 to 1.5 per cent. Most of china's oil comes from Russia and much of her road transport. Sitting in a Russian passenger plane of the Chinese National Airways, I landed recently at the so-called civil airports of Changsha, Chengchow, Shanghai and Nanking, to find long lines of sleek jet fighters and ground attack aircraft – Migs and Ilyushins, every one delivered by the USSR.

Gratitude Doubted

China's gratitude for all this is open to doubt. Russian aid is not freely given and must be paid for in agricultural products, raw materials, consumer goods and foreign exchange to a tune that recently reduced Peiping to supplying such items as ping-pong balls in an effort to meet her commitments.

Things are not what they were. The days when Peiping disposed of the credits and Soviet equipment was pouring into China are almost past.

Today, China is faced with the business of footing the bill and there is no news of further Russian munificence.

It is not surprising, therefore, if China is doing a little economic rethinking. Eager for quick industrial power and economic independence, Peiping is developing a formirable drive for the creation of tens of thousands of small plants run on Chinese genius for improvised backyard industry, as against building vast factory complexes whose construction requires four to five years and much expensive advice and equipment from friendly but pragmatic Socialist countries.

Given this gentle but greasy downward slope in Sino-Soviet relations it becomes difficult to gauge the extent to which Moscow can act as a brake on an increasingly self-assertive Peiping. Today, a blank check transfer of tension to the Strait of Formosa. A bargain has been struck that must admirably suit Peiping whatever the misgivings in Moscow, for although Russia may, in the last analysis, still control today, her leaders must bear in mind that China may well hold the option on tomorrow.
