Theater Humanizes Religious Dramas

By CLAIRE COX
United Press International

New York — (UPI) — The churches are humanizing religion drama, and so is the professional theater.

The newest in a series of 20th century Biblical plays is the work of Paddy Chayevsky, author of "Marty," "The Tenth Man" and "Middle of the Night." He has taken the Book of Judges, Chapter 6-8, as the text of his new hit play, "Gideon."

Actually, Chayevsky protests that his play is neither Biblical nor religious. It is as much a morality play as were his earlier works, he says. As far as he is concerned, Gideon is an Israelite version of Marty — a well-meaning coward who becomes a hero in spite of himself.

"Gideon" is the fruit of extensive Biblical research that took Chayevsky to the Holy Land, where he walked the ground trod by Biblical characters and even filmed areas he later depicted on the stage. He read the Bible and books about it, studied the writings of archaeologists and perused atlases.

Out of it came a comedy based on the Bible.

Humorless

"The story of Gideon in the Bible is funny," Chayevsky said in an interview. "You can get a couple of howls out of it just by reading it. For two thousand years, religion has been humorless. Now we are going back to humor."

Chayvesky's play is concerned largely with a tug-o'-war between Gideon and God, the latter portrayed by Fredric March in a costume and makeup that gives him the appearance of the North Wind. God succeeds in persuading man to give up false idols and then masterminds a military victory achieved through Gideon's efforts.

Gideon becomes noble and then in a farewell to God announces that after all the fuss to get rid of false idols, man is going to have a whole set of new ones.

Chayevsky said a few ministers and rabbis had indicated their disapproval of his concept of God as a deity that can be cruel as well as kind. But churchmen generally have been generous in their praise and a number of religious groups already are seeking permission to stage the play themselves.

Historical

"I really do not think the play is religius," Chayevsky insisted. "My primary aim was a good dramatic plot with moral content. I am a morality writer. This is absolutely elemental existentialism. If people are not interested in existentialism per se, they are interested in it without knowing what it is.

"Most people find the play informative. If nothing else, it is archaeologically sound. It is obviously not obscure. No one leaves saying 'I wonder what he meant.' They should walk out with understanding and a sense of having had fun."

It is Chayevsky's opinion, after reading the Bible, that the concept of God changed gradually through the centuries and that the God he presents in his play was an early version.

"God was a good fellow up to about the time of Elijah," he said. "He came down and chatted with people on their terms. Later he became austere."

Although he acknowledges that Gideon and Marty have much in common, Chayevsky says his next set of characters will be of a different stripe. He is going from the Bible to the Communist Manifesto for his next play.

"If Gideon ends with the point that man can't believe in God and finds it easier to believe in himself," Chayevsky said, "the next play has to be what happens when he does believe that man is God — and that is the Russian Revolution."

In other words, the moral of "Gideon" will be contained in an entire new play. The epilogue to "Gideon" is still being written.
