Radical Charter Is Up for Vote Today

United Press Service

DETROIT, Mich., Feb. 10.—After one of the most spirited campaigns in the history of politics, voters of Detroit went to the polls today to ratify or reject the proposed new city charter, written last fall by a board of charter commissioners. Early indications were that voting would be heavy.

The proposed charter is considered more or less of a compromise between the demands of those who wanted as few changes as possible in the old document, but it leans to the radical, rather than the conservative side.

It provides for a separation of city from state and national elections; the election of city officers every four years on a non-partisan ballot, with a preferential feature, permitting citizens to vote for second and third choices; a concentration of power in the hands of the mayor, who, like every other city official, is made subject to the recall; the initiative and referendum, municipal ownership of the gas plant and the extension of the public lighting service to private consumers and control of telephone rates and service by the common council.

City ownership of the street car lines was authorized at a special election last April, but a new charter amendment on that subject strengthens the old provisions.

The proposed charter provides that the common council shall be cut from thirty-six to twenty-one members, one from each city ward. The board of estimates is abolished and control over the budget given to the council and mayor.

A minimum wage of $2.50 a day on all city work, or by contractors, is provided. A department of labor welfare is created, to have general charge of all labor interests and to arbitrate disputes between employer and employe.

Is Little Jeff to Stay in Giant Line-up This Season?

There is much speculation around the stoves of the Winter League as to whether or not 'Little Jeff" Tesreau, the gigantic slabster on McGraw's payroll for three years, is to be continued in the Giant personnel. Many hold that the twirler is all in, and that he will go into the discard.

Tesreau has friends all over the National circuit, however, and they say that there are many others on the New York team who could be discarded before it would be necessary to sacrifice Jeff. In 1911, he led the National League in pitching, and his work in 1912 was also well up in the column.

Even his best friends agree that in the latter part of the 1913 season Tesreau's playing was not up to its standard. He made a miserable showing in the world's series, but then, he was shot in just as the Athletics were hitting their worst. When the Giants flit southward, they say, Jeff will be there, too.

The Enduring Gift

Rings have always been more than gifts.

They carry with them more than mere gift sentiment. They have a sweet significance and regard of the giver, as well as the enduring quality of the gift in itself. So when you give let your gift bring its message of love and fulfill also that existing desire for something beautiful.

Give a ring, a handsome ring, a ring you can afford.

Our rings are of solid gold. They are so well made that we guarantee to replace and reset free, any stone that may ever work loose, diamonds excepted.
