Many strangers are coming to town of late, looking for homes. A number of inquiries are also being made for farm property. Last Saturday over 500 immigrants arrived in Portland, described as having means to buy land and homes. Hillsboro's proximity to Portland gives it quite an advantage in securing a good share of the new comers. Our local real estate agents report many inquiries, and not a few sales are taking place. An old resident the other day remarked that he did not know half of the citizens of the town, when a few years ago, he knew them all.

McCabe, the contractor on the P. R. & N. who took a contract to grade and build 7 miles of the Company's road from the 20 mile post to the 27 mile post, will finish his contract in about two weeks. The right of way has all been cleared to the 27 mile post, and rails have been laid to that point, with construction trains running over that stretch of the road. McCabe's contract included the big tunnel, which is now fully completed. In making the tunnel the contractor removed 24 150 cubic yards of rock from the mountain.

County Judge J. B. Messick, of Baker County, upon the request of several county courts of the state has issued a call for a state meeting of the County Courts and County Commissioners, at which it is expected to perfect a state organization similar to those existant in other states. Judge Lionel R. Webster, of Multnomah County, will act as Chairman of the Reception Committee, with power to name his associates. The gathering will convene at the Convention Hall of the Portland Commercial Club (6th floor) at ten o'clock Tuesday morning, June 7th, and continue through the day.

Forest Grove defeated the St. John Apostles last Sunday at Forest Grove, in a game replete with errors. Both teams went up in the air several times and the scores made were due to these ascensions. Not an earned run was made. The final score was 6 to 4 in favor of Forest Grove. In the first inning, St. John made a score and then nothing else was done until the sixth, although the teams were in danger several times. In this inning, St. John put two runs over the pan and Forest Grove registered three. Three more tallies were allowed to be added by Forest Grove in the next inning. The Apostles landed another run in the eighth. Robinson, of Forest Grove, struck out eighth men, and Olney fanned seven. St John made four hits [illegible] three of [illegible]

"The very fact that every one expects me to marry you," declared Clara Adams, "is the main reason why I don't want to do it. It makes me furious to have your parents and my parents decide the whole matter for us."

"I am glad you feel that way about it," Roger Armstrong declared heartily—at least, the cunning dog succeeded well in assuming an appearance of great heartiness. "Of course I was willing enough and am now to marry you to please our people, but I don't want you against your will, you know."

"That's it exactly," assented the girl. She did not, however, seem quite pleased. "Of course we'll be very good friends, and all that, still, but we simply must show independence. Naturally I'll be tremendously interested in the girl you marry, and I'll try to see that you get the right one."

"And I'll be very much interested in your man," declared Roger. "I hope you'll be as happy as I mean to be. I'm going to look for a nice, quiet little cottage on a nice, quiet little street."

The girl looked distinctly displeased now, but she conquered herself bravely.

"Me, too," echoed she. "Another reason why I hate to have them arrange for me to marry you is because I know they'd expect us either to live in your father's place or in my father's home."

"I want a little place where there won't be a lot of servants and where I can go into the kitchen and cook myself without causing a miniature scandal."

"I mean to have a husband that's poor—that is, not too poor—and that has to work each day. And while he is gone during the day I'll fix every thing nice and cosy and comfortable for him when he comes home tired out in the evening."

"You've got the idea!" cried Roger somewhat excitedly. "Why don't you pick out the kind of a place that you want so that you'll have it all ready when you find the kind of man that you want? I'll tell you what we'll do. You pick out your prospective home, and I'll pick out the kind of place I want for my wife. Then we'll compare them."

"All right," laughed the girl gayly and ran from the lawn, where they had been talking, up the path to the big stone house where she lived.

Pursuant to their plan, the young man met the girl the following afternoon.

"Did you find your home?" he asked gayly.

"Oh, yes, I did!" she cried. "It's the dearest little place imaginable. I fell in love with it at first sight. I can hardly wait for you to see it. And did you find your home too?"

"I certainly did," replied the man. "It's a dandy—a cosy little place back among the trees. Now all we need is the right man and the right girl. By the way, you may be interested. I saw a girl this morning that looked to me as if she would make just the right kind of a wife for me."

Clara did not smile so much at this.

"You aren't really thinking of marrying her?" she gasped.

"Oh, I think so," the man replied easily. "She looked very capable to me."

"I hope you'll be satisfied with her," the girl said after a piqued little silence. "I know I shall be satisfied with my husband. He's mighty handsome."

"What?" cried Roger. "You haven't gone and picked out your husband, have you?"

Clara demurely surveyed Rogers' countenance, which did not look quite so indifferent now, but betrayed decided annoyance.

"Yes," she replied. "I only realized today that he's the only man I want. Something—something brought my feelings for him to a decision all of a sudden."

"Well, I never!" ejaculated the man, a pained tone evident in his voice. "I—I never suspected that you were really in love, Clara. Who—who is this man?"

A bright light came into the girl's eyes as she surveyed his perturbation; but, nevertheless, she laughed gayly.

"I may tell you—some time," she replied, "but I'll not tell you now, for here we are almost at my house. Isn't it the dearest little place? See what a big veranda it has, and there's another big one in the rear, overlooking the sweetest old fashioned garden."

The man gazed at the house once and at the girl two or three times.

"Is this the house that you've picked out?" he asked finally.

"Yes," said the girl.

"Well, see here," remonstrated he. "It's rather cool of you, you know. This is the very house that I picked out for myself."

Some few minutes later the man and the girl were seated on the rear veranda, rather close together.

"You say you won't give [the] house to my wife and [I?]" he asked.

"Silly!" replied Clara. "[Of course] I'll not."

"And, naturally," [he went on,] "I'll not give it up to you [and my] husband. Consequently [there is] one way out of it that I see."

"What's that?" asked the girl [somewhat] tremulously.

"Why, marry each other!"

A slow flush spread over [her] face.

"But that's just what we [are going] to do. Everyone expects us [to do it.]"

At that moment voices rang [out] from the interior of the house. [As] they had been seated on the [veranda] some one had entered. Roger [spoke] to the girl suddenly.

"It's our mothers," he whispered.

The girl nodded.

"I'm so glad that we've [obtained] lease on this dear house," [the] voices said. "It's an ideal [place for] Clara and Roger to begin [their life] together."

The other voice assented, [and then] on, "I'm so happy in their hap[piness]."

The voices trailed away [as the] speakers went into another room. [Sud]denly Roger turned to the [girl and] putting his arm around her [drew her] close.

"Dear," he said, "don't you [think it] would be a shame to bring [together] them—and to—to—by not [letting] each other?"

Apparently the girl's [reply was] satisfactory, for a moment later [none] of them appeared as though [they] could ever touch them.

Here is the question: The [governor] of Kgovjnj, a very mean man, [invited] to give a very small dinner [party. He] invited his father's brother-in-[law, his] brother's father-in-law, his [father-in-]law's brother-in-law and his [brother-]in-law's father-in-law. How [many] guests were there?

Here is the answer: None. The [gov]ernor dined alone.

Here is the explanation: The [governor] or was a widower with a [marriage]able daughter and a marriage[able sis]ter. The governor's father was [a] widower. The governor and his [father] married sisters. Thus the [father] became his father's brother-[in-law.] The governor's brother married [the] governor's stepdaughter; thus the [gov]ernor became his brother's father-[in-]law. The governor's father [had] married the governor's sister; [thus the] governor became his father's [father-in-law] brother-in-law. The governor's [father]-in-law married the governor's [step]daughter; thus the governor's [father-in-law became] his brother-in-law's father-in-law. The governor therefore dined alone.

Origin of the Opera.

In one sense the opera is one of the oldest forms of entertainment. Its origin is to be found in the old drama. In its modern sense, however, it dates from the year 1597 when Peri produced the first Italian opera to grace the festival of the marriage of Henry IV of France and Marie de' Medici. The work attracted great attention and many Italian nobles figured in the cast. In France the opera was the outcome of the ballet and in England of the masque. Purcell is credited with the honor of producing the first English opera, although one of Jonson's masques was set to music as early as 1617.
