Road Tax Out, Voters Decide

and the farming representatives. Protagonists of the levy argued that more building is being carried on in the territory east of Beaverton to the Multnomah county line than in all the rest of the county. The only thing, one speaker asserted, that is keeping this from being a real building and buying boom is the lack of adequate road facilities.

"Give us the roads," he said, "and within a few years the taxes from that one section of the county will be paying all the county's expenses."

West Section Has Plea

Barnes road section backers claimed that a 100,000-acre area, which would never be used for farming, is awaiting the advent of roads. "We have water, lights, electricity—everything but roads," it was stated. J. O. Johnson, representing Metzger and Garden Home people, declared that road improvement there will induce many more builders.

From the western section of the county came a plea for improvement of the Banks-Buxton road. Judge Templeton explained that plans were already under way for improving the surface condition of this road, but that no realigning would be carried on with it, since it is near the Wolf Creek road and most of its traffic will be cared for in the future by the new road after its completion.

The question was raised concerning the use of the truckmen's bond in repairing roads damaged by logging trucks or other large hauling vehicles. Templeton said that about $800 had been claimed from the bonds and used on road work in the past, but that in the majority of cases, it was futile to attempt to lay the blame for road injury or destruction to any one trucker.

Co-operation Plea Made

Co-operation in road work between county and government agencies is not satisfactory, asserted Grant Brown in discussing the WPA-financed improvement of the Baseline road east of Hillsboro.

"It's too bad," Brown humorously remarked, "that our children and grandchildren can't be here to see how we're spending their money."

Much of the rock once placed on the road in question is now being covered up under layers of dirt fill, and will be of no value in the new road.

County Engineer J. W. Barney explained that an attempt had been made to reclaim some of the old rock on the road, but that the amounts saved did not justify the expense required for the salvage work. The average road, Barney said, loses nearly one half an inch each year from its surface as the result of wear, blowing away, washouts, and being thrown into roadside grass and ditches. The county, he said, is responsible for only the material cost on such projects as the Baseline road.

Larger Shares Asked

Larger county shares of state highway gasoline and automobile tax funds were demanded in several of the short talks which made up most of the meeting's activity.

Ferd Groner declared "I don't believe in county taxes when so much money is going to the state on automobile taxes. The state is spending money like a drunken sailor. Two pleasure roads to the beach are too much—what we need are more roads to the market, and this should be supplied rather than the pleasure highways."

Judge Templeton told of the stand of the Association of Oregon Counties, when the delegates from Western Oregon counties sought a larger allocation of state auto funds to the counties, but were opposed and outnumbered by those from the southern and eastern counties, where state roads constitute most of the road systems. The desired larger allocations are not coming immediately, but may come within five or six years, he said.

Ross Outlines Stand

State Senator E. L. Ross, sponsor of a bill in the last legislative session to return secondary highways and with them more automobile funds, to the counties, also spoke on this topic. "It would be setting a bad precedent for the county to vote this two mill tax," he said. "I do not believe Oregon counties are receiving their proper share of the gasoline taxes. County road upkeep over a year averages $120 a mile, which is less than the costs of the state highway department for the same type of upkeep work."

J. W. Guler, in an impassioned plea for the tax, said "If it is not voted, those on those roads included in the improvement plan will suffer. I can't afford the millage—but I'm going to vote for it! We can't keep on using our roads year after year without spending some money to keep them up and improve them."

Last November was the worst traffic death month in Oregon history, with 55 victims. Cutting that total is part of he purpose of a campaign now being waged by Secretary of State Earl Snell to make autumn driving safer.

Drivers with one year's experience are nearly four times as likely to have accidents as those with six or more year's experience, a study made by Secretary of State Earl Snell shows. He concludes that the mere holding of a license should not lead the driver to feel he has nothing more to learn about handling his car in traffic.
