U. S. Machines Help Increase British Food

at depots and leased by the county war boards to contractors who used the machinery to assist the many farmers in the area. At these machinery depots, there was a complete repair unit, usually of some 25 machinists, as well as 15 to 20 operators learning how to operate and repair tractors and other field machinery. While the people are deeply appreciative of the machinery they have received, they are hoping that more is yet to follow, for they still have a great need for it in their food program.

"So successful was the battle of tractor against U-boat that British farmers proudly state, and their Minister of Agriculture confirms it, that they have increased their food production 100 per cent. Britian has gone a long way but still has a long way to go in putting her farms on a basis of units of a size for successful economical farm operations. They are discussing this problem as they go along. It is a subject they often discuss in their meetings, in their homes, and in the highest offices of their country."

Tompkins told of wheat on land not over eight inches deep above the chalk producing 60 bushels of wheat to the acre. Thirty or 40 bushels was the least production reported. He saw potatoes producing from 100 to 300 sacks per acre. Barley yield was heavy, vegetables abundant. Citing an illustration of the tsepping up of production, Tompkins related that in one county where only 15 acres of tomatoes were grown two years ago, 750 acres were grown this year. England is now self-supporting in the production of sugar.

Tompkins made the trip to Britian accompanied by an American representative of a farm bureau and an agriculture representative. He told of the trip across the Atlantic, of the precautions taken and of the rationing of water aboard ship. He told of the boat being escorted into Scotland by British Spitfire planes and of hearing the German radio telling how the ship on which Tompkins was traveling had been bombed. It was like "hearing your own funeral" he said.

"Women are doing wonderful work in England," the speaker declared. "They are in all lines of work."

Tompkins stated that although his trip to Britain was made possible by the British government, the British did not attempt to direct the trip. He attended a press conference, the first time that American agriculturists had the opportunity of attending such a meeting.
