Flood Problems For Portland Cited by Bowes

Problems facing Portland as a result of the flood were discussed at the Rotary club luncheon this noon by City Commissioner William Bowes of Portland. While much of the flood involved properties outside the city limits, the problem is Portland's and probably will be for years to come, he said.

The dike that broke and wiped out Vanport was not expected to go out, according to Bowes, who said that 30 minutes after the dike went out there was nothing left in this war-built city that had housed from 20,000 to 22,000 persons. The surprising thing is that there was such a small loss of life.

Sightseers caused the biggest problem immediately following the flood, asserted Bowes, who said it was necessary to call out all available police officers to direct traffic.

Portland already had a difficult housing condition because of its swollen population that developed from the war and since, according to the speaker. People opened their homes to the flood victims and the Red Cross and other relief agencies furnished food and clothing. It is a difficult problem to move the flood evacuees from private homes to some kind of shelter, Bowes said.

The government furnished 3000 trailers for the flood victims, but the city faces a big problem of where to place them because of the fear held by many that the trailer settlements may become permanent, according to the commissioner, who said they had only been able to find a place for 600. However, he said, they must be put someplace.

Flood damage within the city itself is estimated at around $1,150,000 and this apparently will have to be handled by Portland property owners as the federal government does not assist with anything other than dike replacement, Bowes said. The water system was not hurt, but the sewer system was badly damaged and many streets must be replaced. Building and basement damage will require a thorough check of foundations by structural engineers, but the complete damage cannot be determined until the water goes down, he said.

Queried relative to the committee from Vanport that appeared before the council, Bowes said that while he sympathized with the victims the committee leadership was radical.

Alf O. Johnson was program chairman. L. B. Hall will be in charge next week and Harley Smith will be editor of the Nairater.
