SATURDAY..... AUGUST 17, 1889.

People do not appear to profit anything by experience in the way of fires in the woods. There is a State law on that subject, and every year the fire gets loose, burns up hundreds of cords of wood and destroys a great deal of valuable timber. Houses, barns and fences also go up in flames and smoke every season. This year is just like every other one. The loss will probably be as heavy as last season or the one preceding. This seems to be a case where age and experience brings no wisdom.

The axe-weilder of the Post-Office Department under Harrison has removed the heads of 13,000 fourth class postmasters. This exceeds by 9,000 the removals made in the same time by the late Democratic Administration, coming into power after its party had been proscribed from the Federal offices for twenty four years.

The Electrican reports a rumor from Berlin to the effect that a means has been discovered of using electricity for ascertaining the true north, instead of the magnetic needle; that, in short, the new means will be superior to the compass, and is likely to supercede it.
