POULTRY YARD

PULLETS.

Which to Winter Over. How to Feed For Eggs.

The value of a pullet as a layer is an unknown quantity until she has been tried. To pullet this is slow in getting to work is expensive, as the cost of her keep is going on and will finally have to be deducted from the receipts before any profit can be found. These points must be considered before determining what birds to winter over. Then, too, owing to immaturity, pullets always lay small eggs, which are too deficient in stamina to make a vigorous hatch like those from women's hens. For this reason it is particularly desirable that the first laying of eggs from a pullet should never be incubated. Old hens make better sitters and more careful mothers than pullets. The latter will lay the larger number of eggs the year after their growth is completed. A pullet that does not begin to lay before she is six months old, will never produce enough eggs to pay for the time she has wasted. She should be sent to market without further delay, no matter how promising she may be. This seems hard sometimes, but it is this pickaninny pullet that never performs, which pulls down the profit of this poultry keeper. "Handsome is as handsome does" is a good old rule to go by.

The early pullets should now have begun their winter's work, and it is the duty of the farmer to keep them steadily at it. This cannot be accomplished by feeding corn alone. They must have green food and lean meat. Cut green bone, linseed meal, bran, oats or wheat with clover or other green food must be used in combination with the corn, if eggs and health are to be regarded.

Of course, it is much easier to scatter the corn than it is to prepare any other food, besides it is so plentiful and cheap, and we have used it before as a staple article of food. Very true, but in those days, fresh eggs were unknown in winter and our fowls had a trick of dying of apoplexy. The scarcity of corn this year showed us the benefit of a mixed ration. We no longer have the excuse that we know no better. The cheapness of an article depends upon the amount of work that can be got out of it, and food ceases to be cheap when it defeats the article for which it is fed. When the low price of corn tempts us this winter, we must remember that we are keeping our fowls for eggs, not show, and we must feed not a fat but an egg-making ration, and give plenty of exercise. Nor must we consider our ease. Poultry keeping is no business for the lazy man, and eggs can only be produced by combined effort of the hen and her owner. The latter must do his share. He must take time to prepare a warm morning meal, see that the hen house is kept clean, the birds free from vermin, avoid all draughts, supply fresh water and sharp grit, scatter grain to compel the necessary exercise by scratching, and send the birds to roost with full crops, which will act as fuel and enable them to keep warm. It is care and discretion in attending to these things as well as the exercise of judgment in the kind and amount of food that make the successful egg producer.

MONEY IN CHICKENS.

Southern Pacific Is Fostering Another Industry.

In addition to assisting in the development of the dairy business in the Willamette Valley, the Southern Pacific, through its general freight and passenger agent, C. H. Markham, is now interesting itself in the possibilities of the poultry industry. Mr. Markham is of the opinion that this branch of farming is one which can be made most profitable, and thinks that it will pay farmers generally to take it up, either in connection with other branches of farming, or as a business by itself. On this matter, he said to an Oregonian man yesterday:

"Speaking of diversified farming, the raising of chickens for market is one which ought to receive attention at the hands of our farmers. During the year 1899 there were shipped from Kansas and Nebraska to California over this company's lines 224 carloads of poultry. The handling of these shipments requires cars of special construction, for which a heavy rental is charged in addition to the freight rate. The loss in transit is considerable, as is also the cost of feeding and expenses of a man in charge.

"The rate from Kansas and Nebraska to California is $1.75 per 100 pounds, or $350 per car. The average number of chickens to a car is about 4000, weighing about four pounds each, but the freight charge is based on a minimum of 20,000 pounds. The cost of laying shipments down in California, therefore, is not less than 3 cents per pound, equal to 12 cents for each chicken, or $1.44 per dozen.

"Chickens are selling in Portland today for from $4.50 to $5 per dozen, and I am informed that a coop of choice ones sold this morning for $6.50. This would seem to indicate that our home market is not being adequately supplied.

"The freight from Oregon to San Francisco is not one-half what it is from Kansas and Nebraska, and as a matter of fact express service can be obtained for as low as $1.50 per 100 pounds.

"Climatic conditions are very much in favor of Oregon, and there is no reason why Oregon chickens should not replace those from Kansas and Nebraska in the California market. As is well known, chickens do not thrive in California, there being some adverse climatic condition. We will always have at our very doors a market for our surplus poultry."

Mr. Markham learned yesterday from Traveling Freight Agent Lounsberry, who is now working up the dairy business in Southern Oregon, that the citizens of Medford had indignantly rejected the proposal to start a skimming station there to supply the Ashland creamery. They believe that if Ashland can support a creamery, so can Medford, and they prefer to have an entire plant for butter and cheese making to a separator which shall only serve to assist an enterprise in another town.—Oregonian.

Uncle Sam's Poultry.

Poultry culture in America is giving $100 yearly to 1,815,000 men, women and children. At the most conservative estimate, there are 150,000,000 fowls in Uncle Sam's poultry ranches. It is estimated that $2.50 will purchase a hen and furnish her quarters, thus making an aggregate of $375,000,000 which has been acquired during our national existence, showing that one dollar of every $164 of Uncle Sam's investments are in poultry yards. That is the amount you would have to have to buy the plant. Where has Uncle Sam another $375,000,000 invested that enables 1,815,000 people to secure a living, thereby? Uncle Sam's hoarded wealth is $61,459,000,000. This, on an average, gives $930 per capita. Yet the $375,000,000 in the poultry yards take only about $200 capital to support and give each laborer $400 on the average.

How do I make this out? It is conceded the each family or the average family, consumes in poultry meat and eggs, $56 yearly. This is an aggregate of $816,000,000. It is conceded also that our hotels and restaurants consume $100,000,000 more; and that our manufacturers use all imported eggs and the stale eggs of our home production, in fact, that they consume $8,000,000 worth and that in the way of medicines, etc., $15,000,000 more. Grand product at $725,000,000.

This represents the labor of 1,815,000 people. It is also conceded that a hen pays 100 per cent over and above that which she eats. Thus, those who labor in the field to produce their food, get one-half this product, while those who work in the yards as care takers, get the other half, and all are paid $400 each by this poultry plant. It is a grand income when we think of it; and when we are forced to see that the saved wealth of the whole nation in less than three per cent of its gross profits, we get credit for what little we do in this matter.

Now, have we not a claim upon our agricultural boards for protection and help in poultry culture? I have been talking to our own people, and citing the work done in Rhode Island to induce them to create an office in their board of agriculture of commissioner of Poultry Culture. Should they do this, they will do more to increase our agriculture than is now being done in any one of its branches. That far, poultry culture is what necessity has made it—not what capital and work can make it. Rhode Island has her experimental station and her state poultry yards, and their work has already been of immense use to her breeders and furnishes object lessons to her sister states.—I. K. Felch in Ohio Poultry Journal.

Fruit and Fowls Again.

Our request in January issue for experiences on the question of keeping fowls in orchards has brought numerous replies. We are surprised to find them so generally favorable to the practice.

M. E. Cunningham, New Corydon, Ind., writes: "My experience is that trees do better in a poultry yard than anywhere else. I planted a dozen plum trees, and at the age of three years they all bloomed nicely but I got no plums. The next spring I divided my lot, making a chicken park on one side, taking in five of the trees. The trees all bloomed again and the seven trees out of the park had a few knotty plums, but the five in the park had two bushels of the nicest fruit I ever saw."

Leon A. Potter, Salem, S. D., reports: "My experience in that line is far more satisfactory than Mr. Moody's. I raise the Brown Leghorns, and any one that has any knowledge of poultry knows that the Leghorns are the greatest foragers of the poultry tribe. I have my fowls running in my plum and apple grove, and find that they do ten times more good than harm in ridding the trees of all kinds of injurious insects, that otherwise would strip the trees of both foliage and fruit. My plum trees were low tops, many of the lowest branches sweeping the ground, and I failed to find fruit, except windfalls, that was injured by the fowls. Mr. Moody complains of his fowls picking the blossoms from his trees. My hens never troubled me in that way, and I always found the best fruit and most thrifty looking trees where the poultry had free run of the same."

W. R. Matthews, Hesperia, Mich., has had a favorable experience. He writes: "I have had experience in this line as I have a fruit farm, and am also in the poultry business. I built my poultry house at the side of my pear, plum and peach orchard so my fowls would run in it. After the trees were old enough to bear fruit, I sowed clover between them, leaving room to cultivate the trees. By cultivating the trees the fowls have fresh earth to dust in and fresh gravel to eat. I consider my poultry beneficial to my orchard. They eat the curculio from the plum trees, and the grub and borers from the peach and pear. I have never in five years seen a chicken fly into one of my trees, and I believe they never did. I used to have the Leghorns and the Plymouth Rocks, but for the past two years I have kept nothing but Wyandottes, and none of them ever bother the fruit or buds. Perhaps the clover saves the fruit. I find that chickens fall into habits and we can't tell why. Some flocks will get to flying so it takes a high fence to hold them, while other flocks of the same breed do not fly. Some flocks will scratch a garden and farm all to pieces, while others of the same breed do not scratch badly. Mr. Moody's fowls undoubtedly lacked a ration of green food. But I have seen very destructive when they were not hungry. They are peculiar."

You had better not be too ready to dispose of the rooster after his first season of service. Keep him, as he will be more valuable for a breeder next year than this.

Have the boys or girls keep a systematic account of the poultry business, so you will be able to determine the profits. It will, at the same time be teaching them lessons in business that will be of value to them.

Give the poultry an occasional feed of boiled vegetables. Almost anything that you have on your table is good for the chicks and the hens, and much wasted material from the kitchen, such as peas-pods, parings, etc., can be used to excellent advantage. It will pay to give your young chickens a separate run as soon as the hen leaves them to shift for themselves, also to separate the young cockerels from the pullets.
