Hegardt, who is in charge of the government work at the jetties, was elected an honorary member and the following were elected to active membership: C. A. Coolidge, H. E. Nelson, C. G. Palmberg, John Blasick, M. Both, George W. Woods, and E. Cummings.

WANTED A BRIDE.

Hood River Rancher Makes a Novel Proposal.

Romance has come into the life of Julia Torppa, spinster, in a most unexpected manner. Julia is blue-eyed, blonde and dimpled. Incidentally she looks after the culinary troubles in the home of J. T. Ross, of the firm of Ross, Higgins & Co. She is a plump little maid from the land of the vikings who knows more of the language of cupid than of the twisted and tangled mazes of idiomatic English.

But to the romance in question. Somewhere in the Hood River district, presumably in a lonely spot, dwells a bachelor, whose soul yearns for an affinity. Between yearnings he is occupied with the more prosaaic task of cultivating strawberries for the Astoria market. His name of G. A. Shirton, and according to his own statement he has a good home, and he is authority for the additional information that he is willing to share it with a suitable mate.

Opportunities for courtship apparently are rare in the Hood river country so Mr. Shirton decided on a novel manner. In a box of lucious berries, the finest in the crate, he placed a note. And that note, though brief as to length, recited that he was tired of single blessedness and that his little dove cote needed a mate to make life that "grand sweet song," that one Grover Cleveland, Democrat, pictured married life. He reasoned with bachelor astuteness that it would be a good housekeeper that would secure the finest berries, and he wanted such a one.

Alas for his plans. The berries were sent to Mr. Ross' home and the plump, dimpled Julia proceeded to hull them. In the bottom was a leaf torn from an old account book. Now Julia has barely a speaking acquaintance with the English language and it was necessary to have the contents translated. When it was made clear to her that he wanted a life companion Julia did what any other woman would have done under the circumstances—she blushed. Her dimples deepened and the blood came and went in her rosy cheeks as she murmured something in her native tongue, which was probably synonomous with that time honored, "This is so sudden."

But Mr. Shirton's hopes are in vain. Julia will not have him. She has other matrimonial plans and they do not fit in with a strawberry ranch on the Hood river. No answer was returned to the proposal and if this comes under the notice of Mr. Shirton, he will understand that he is refused once and for all—by Julia. But there are other maids, and affinities are plentiful

VALUE OF EDUCATION

REV. B. F ROWLAND'S SERMON ON ITS PLACE IN HISTORY.

Scholars and College Bred Men Who Have Guided Great Movements and Reforms.

Educational day was observed at the Methodist church last Sunday at both the morning and evening service. The following is an abstract of the discourse delivered by Dr. Rowland at the evening service. His theme being "Educated Men," and said in part:

The fiercest struggle in this country is at the cradle of our children. On one side stands the infidel, bold and defiant, presenting the lamp of reason; on the other the Christian, devout and believing, holding forth the light of revelation. The impregnant question is, which shall control the education of the child. Shall that education be secular or religious? or shall the two be so united that the secular shall work no evil while the religious shall permeate and sanctify the development of the intellect?

Those who advocate purely secular education claim that the safety of the state depends upon intelligence and not religion. This is assumed by some pulpits, many rostrums and journals. Christianity is challenged to prove itself a necessity in the development of the intellect for the welfare of the republic.

This purely secular theory of education ignores conscience. Whatever conscience may or may not be, it can be educated. The prime factors in an educated conscience are, belief in a personal God, reverence for His laws and a dread of His displeasure. What is the restraint on the dangerous classes in our city? Is it not that somewhere either within or outside the city there is a power that is capable of displeasure and adequate to manifest the same and to put down the dangerous element though it arise en masse? By what force shall we keep men from vice and crime? By the displeasure of good citizens? But that displeasure is the child of religious education. Shall they be deterred by the beneficence of public morals? But that, too, is a gift from God. What then shall be the standard? Expediency, or social compact? or a human stipulation to be enforced and broken at will? To reject the idea of an educated conscience is to place virtue under the dominion of the passions.

This theory of education has no elements to purify and reform.

Knowledge enlightens but it cannot renew and elevate that which is depraved in principle and sinful in practice. There is nothing essentially reformatory in it. Astronomy may weigh the stars and geology estimate the age of the rocks but they cannot purify the human heart. Philosophy may speak profoundly of unanswered questions, but it can never fathom the depths of human iniquity. Mathematics may measure the universe and calculate the immensity of space but it can never demonstrate that there is profit in gaining the world and losing the soul. Chemistry may admit one into the secret laboratory of the divine but it can never reform the drunkard or reclaim the outcast. The most renowned chemist of New England committed the greatest crime known to law.

There is a portrait at the capital of the Nation upon which great men gaze with delight. It is that of one of the most eminent jurists in the annals of our country. When a youth in college he excelled in all his studies. While his classmates were plodding through Zenophon, he was reading the Greek tragedies. Euclid, Newton and La Place were as familiar to him in their highest thoughts as the multiplication table; language, ancient and modern, was his delight. On the day of his graduation he demanded two degrees from his Alma Mater; that night he led to the bridal altar one of the most beautiful and gifted of New England's daughters. He entered his chosen profession of law and became attorney general. Chief Justice Marshall looked with admiration upon this man as he stood before the bar of the supreme court. Everywhere he was admired for his brilliant intellect for the accomplishments of his parts. Yet Talcott was a drunkard.

I know there is in some localities a popular distrust of the courage and sagacity of the educated man. Franklin and Lincoln are good enough for us, exclaims this zealous skepticism as if Franklin and Lincoln were not scholars. Humanity falls among thieves and we are told that the college Levite the educated Pharasee passes by on the other side. Slavery undermines the republic but the clergy are the educated class, says the critic, and the church becomes the bulwark of slavery. Strong drink slays its ten of thousands but the educated class, we are told, leaves the gospel of temperance to be preached by the ignorant and the enthusiasts just as the English church left the preaching of regeneration to the Methodist itinerants in fields and barns. Great questions cast their shadow upon the future—the relation of capital and labor—distribution of lands—reform in administrative methods—but the educated class exclaims the critic instead of advancing to deal with them promptly, wisely and courageously, lifts a panic cry of communism and sinks paralyzed with fear leaving them to be kindled into fury by demagogues. It is the old accusation—the same libel repeated, generation after generation. Erasmus was the greatest pioneer of modern scholarship, but in the fierce contest of the reformation Luther denounced him as a time-server and a coward.

I lift my voice tonight in defense of this accused class. I challenge any man to prove the forgoing humiliation arraignment true. The educated class do not deserve such wholesale condemnation of political recreancy and moral cowardice. Faithless and cowardly scholars, you may find, but these are the failures and not the representatives of the class. The reformation was the work of educated men. The same is true of the story of liberty. The political "revelation" of England, inspired by the reformation, was directed and carried on by the sons of old Oxford and Cambridge. When Germany sank beneath the heel of Napoleon, it was the universities that saved the national life. New England moulded by her scholarly sons has undoubtedly inspired and shaped our entire national life. It was a son of Harvard who proposed the assembly of the first American congress. It was a son of Yale who declared if taxation without representation were to be enforced the colonies ought to rebel; it was a group of New York scholars who spoke for the Boston port bill and proposed the continental congress; and it was a New England scholar in that congress, who by his fiery eloquence and pathos carried his country up to the very threshold of independence.

I do not forget nor discount that patriotism of the field and fireside that recruited the sons of liberty. The inspiring statute of the Minute man at Concord commemorates the spirit "that left the plow standing in the furrow," that drew Green from his anvil and Hopkins from his farm. But it was scholars of America who conducted the preliminary arrangement of the revolution, aroused the colonies and led them to victory and independence.

And in that other great struggle of our country—the overthrow of human slavery—was the scholar recreant and dumb. Among the earliest anti-slavery leaders was more than a proportionate part of liberally educated men. In congress the commanding voice for freedom was that of old college professors. Whittier, Longfellow, Lowell and Emerson gave to the cause the loftiest scholarly hearts in the Union, while Parker, Channing and Beecher were foremost among the champions of liberty.

Who does not admire the courage and frankness of Garfield in his speech to his constituents when they refused to return him to congress because he had voted alone against his party. He said frankly that he would like to return to his seat and that he was pained to lose the confidence and support of so many friends. "I would do any thing to win your regard," he said, "but there is one man whose good opinion I must have and without which I can do nothing. That is the man with whom I go to bed with every night and get up with every morning, whose thoughts are my thoughts and whose prayers are my prayers. I cannot buy your confidence at the loss of his respect." Is it strange that his constituents, convinced and delighted constituents returned him to congress.

"All men know more than any man," cries the witty diplomat. It is a French epigram replies the scholar and not a general truth. A crowd is not wiser than the wisest man in it. "The voice of the flaming rhetoric of the stump. Not always replies the scholar. The voice of the people of Paris demanded the head of Charlotte Corday. The voice of the people of Jerusalem cried "Away with Him! Crucify Him!" "God is on the side of the strongest battalions," says the party swindler who buys a majority with money or place. On the contrary answers the scholar, reading history and interpreting its lessons God was on the side of Leonidas and not with Xerxes.

It is educated citizenship which, while loyal to the authority of the majority rescues it from the treachery of political pedlars and parasites. It is the wisdom and the energy of the men who are classed as theorists and impracticable which are the foremost and most efficient in breaking the machine and releasing the majority from political corruptions. It is not the demagogue and shouting rabble but the people heeding the word of the thinker and the lesson of experience, which secures the welfare of our government and enlarges human liberties.

AMERICA ADVANCING.

American locomotives are hauling English trains, and the English trains and Englishmen are rolling over American steel rails. Our machinery is sold all over the world. A great American remedy, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, is gradually working its way to all parts of the globe where dyspepsia and indigestion thrive. Like all American products, it is honest, and does just what it claims to do. The most stubborn cases of constipation, biliousness, nervousness, liver and kidney troubles must yield to it. It is the most perfect remedy ever devised for weak stomachs. For fifty years it has been famous for its astonishing efficacy. It is a perfectly natural remedy, and there is nothing to equal it. See that a Private Revenue Stamp covers the neck of the bottle.
