OUR MACHINERY IN GERMANY.

As no further contribution to the discussion of the probable effect upon American manufacturers of the proposed German tariff the senior member of one of the largest machinery importing firms in Germany declares that despite the tariff American electrical appliances and automatic machinery will continue to be imported, since the cost of the machinery is but an insignificant factor in view of the lessened cost of output consequent upon the use of American machines.

It is a curious fact that while German operatives have been able to produce a sufficiently greater output with the aid of American machinery to warrant the purchase of the latter in great quantities during the past decade, they have never been able to achieve as good results as have been accomplished in this country with the same machinery. The personal equation still remains the controlling factor.

German manufacturers may be expected to continue to equip their establishments, tariff or no tariff, with appliances of American make; and for the reason mentioned American manufacturers may hope to retain the footing already won in other export markets as well.—Plattsburgh (N. Y.) Press.

IMPORTATION OF ARMS IN CHINA.

San Francisco Chronicle.

One of the penalties which the powers propose imposing on the Chinese government as a punishment for the crimes committed against foreigners during the Boxer uprising was to deprive it of the right to import arms and ammunition. The motive was to render the imperial authorities powerless to repeat the experience, for there is a moral certainty that they fomented and encouraged the Boxers movement, notwithstanding their disavowals to the contrary. One of the mistaken notions of the Western nations is that which relieves the Chinese government of responsibility for the Boxer rebellion. Without the connivance of the government the rebellion could not have attained the proportions that it did; besides, there were evidences innumerable during the time it was in progress that the imperial troops were co-operating with the insurrectionists.

The prohibition of the importation of arms and ammunition was to have been made the subject of one of the imperial edicts to be appended to the protocol. The vital element in it was that which appealed to the government. But when the edict was submitted to the council of foreign ministers the Imperial government gave another evidence of its gift of evasion by making the prohibition apply only to Chinese subjects. It has been accepted, however, by the ministers in this form, against the protest of Sir Ernest Satow, the British representative, with the understanding that the first paragraph in it, which makes it appear to be the voluntary act of the Chinese government, shall be omitted in the publication as part of the appendix of the protocol. Satow's reasons for objecting to the form of the edict were indisputably well grounded, for, if the importation of arms and ammunition was to be prohibited to the government as a punishment, the elimination of the prohibitive clause is fatal to the purpose. In the accepted form of the edict the Chinese government may import all the arms and ammunition it desires, re-equip Boxers at pleasure and revive the anti-foreign crusade in all its former virulence.

The powers have, however, been proceeding against the Imperial government on the mistaken theory that the Boxer outbreak and its resultant atrocities were due to a failure to properly exercise its authority for its supression and the preservation of peace and order. They are endeavoring to pledge it to preserve order in the empire hereafter and guarantee security to the lives and property of foreign residents. Our own government has entertained this theory, hence Mr. Rockhill objected to the provision prohibiting the Chinese government from importing such materials as will manifestly be needed for its own defense and the enforcement of its authority. If it is insisted, however, that the imperial authorities shall preserve order they cannot be logically deprived of the means of doing so. But if, on the other hand, they instigated the Boxer movement, the powers are inconsistent in relieving them of the intended punishment, for it enables them to replenish their stock of arms and ammunition and repeat the offense at some future date.

From Various Sources.

THE AH FONGS OF HONOLULU.

A Chinese Father and His Thirteen Beautiful Daughters.

Philadelphia Times.

Still another of the famously pretty Ah Fong sisters of Honolulu will be wed to the marriage altar by an American. The Honolulu newspapers say that the approaching wedding in the great Ah Fong mansion in the suburbs of Honolulu will be the most notable event in point of ceremony and style of any similar affairs that have taken place there. Miss Sue Ah Fong will be wedded to Samuel S. Hassold, who had been considered one of the most eligible matrimonial catches in Honolulu for several years. He is a Harvard university man, and heir to large mining wealth, and a traveller and polished club man. After ten years of mingling in society in Europe and much of America, he has laid his heart at the feet of a lovely daughter of the isolated islands in the South Seas and he snaps his finger at all talk about the Chinese father of his prospective bride.

No home in all the broad Pacific has been so well known by American and British naval officers and globe-trotting tourists for longer than a dozen years as the Ah Fong mansion in Honolulu. Naval officers say that very few homes have been so hospitable open to them in their cruises as has been that of Ah Fong—the millionaire Chinese in the Hawaiian Islands.

Ask any naval officer who has been aboard a ship that lay at anchor in the harbor of Honolulu whether he remembers the Ah Fong home and note the dreaming of pleasant memories through his brain. It is a talkative man who tell one of the liberal and charming hospitality dispensed in the Ah Fong mansion among the wonderful grounds filled with trees and shrubs from all tropical lands and of the thirteen Ah Fong girls ranging from toddling infancy to stately womanhood. He may tell you also of the oriental dinner served in the Ah Fong home, when covers were laid for fifty and more guests, of the lovely halls in the bamboo room, of the many piazzas where ladies and gentlemen were welcomed day and evening and entertained with music and much that seemed to have no end. If he was a bit of a sentimentalist he may tell you of the fascinating ballads he heard sung in the Ah Fong home, of the black-eyed, lolly Ah Fong girls and their skill in dancing.

Among foreign people there have been few more ardent admirers of Americans than the Ah Fong family. Long before Hawaii became an American possession the Ah Fongs longed for the union. When the American soldiers were on their way to the Philippines and stopped at Hawaii the Ah Fong girls were always among the first in Honolulu to entertain the boys in blue with dances and public entertainment. Six of the sisters have married American husbands, and each have had happy wedded life. Miss Jessie Ah Fong is now engaged to marry a lieutenant in the United States army in the Philippines when his term of service will have expired next year. Four of the Ah Fong sisters have been married in Honolulu, in San Francisco and in Portland, and Miss Martha Ah Fong, now wife of Lieutenant Dowdesky in Manila, is high priestess of Miss Rosie Mary as charity and generosity.

The Ah Fong sisters, numerous as they are, are not idle. The oldest, Miss Vincent, of New Orleans, is about 25 and the youngest (Miss Annie) is but 12. Mrs. Ah Fong is a handsome woman with a fine complexion, large black eyes and generally pleasing manner, and is a Portuguese born. All of the family are have had their disagreeables and days of trouble and some of them have had more than their share of it. Prince Ah Fong, the mother's younger and the favorite son, died some years ago, to the inconsolable grief of the Ah Fong mourning.

Miss Nellie Ah Fong is now in Paris employed as a model. She is a strikingly handsome brunette, overshadowing all her sisters but her father's blushing rose more than any of her sisters. Mrs. Arthur Johnstone, who was Miss Helena Ah Fong, died four years ago in a Chicago hospital, and the combination of her blue eyes and dark eyelashes and hair and her sinuous, lithe complexion makes her the most generally admired beauty of the family. Several of the sisters have their father's tall stature, but the rest are of petite figures. They have a pronounced suggestion of Chinese slant, moon-shaped eyes and nearly every one of them has the mother's complexion and soft mode of speech. No less authority than Sir Edward Arnold said that the few days he spent at the Ah Fong home a few years ago were the "most tropically charming" he ever knew in the South Seas.

Along about 1858 a young Chinaman named Wing Ah Fong came with a shipload of Chinese to Honolulu. He was highly intelligent and genial, and with a little capital soon built up a prosperous business in Chinese crockery, silks and bric-a-brac. He was soon the leading merchant in Honolulu. He spent money freely and was well liked by whites and blacks in the quaint old town. As he grew in wealth he made love to the daughter, Concepcion, of a poor Portuguese sailor who had floated into Hawaii. The Chinaman's money and his superiority to his fellow swains made him an accepted suitor. So Ah Fong was married in 1862. His wife was fine looking and energetic for that land of languor and siesta. Ah Fong invested in sugar-cane plantations and in the old times, when sugar dividends paid almost incredibly large profits, he grew very rich. In ten years Ah Fong was worth over $500,000, and was adding $75,000 to it annually. He was careful and prudent while his business associates dressed and took no heed of the morrow. He was ever busily watching chances to buy plantation land cheap from the impoverished Hawaiians. By 1870 the Ah Fong sugar plantation on the island of Hilo had become one of the most productive there. While such men as Claus Spreckels made $700,000 and $800,000 annually from sugar exports, Ah Fong made $50,000 and $60,000 annually in the same way.

Meanwhile the Ah Fong family circle widened. There were four children, a boy and three girls—in the home by 1870. Ten more girls were born during the next twelve years. Wing Ah Fong was an ideal father. He was delighted to see how each child resembled the mother in facial expression. He hired servants galore, enlarged his house every few years, and thought nothing too good for his babies. He used to find no greater joy than to get his wife and all his numerous girls in a great lumbering open carriage like a Concord coach, that he had built according to his own ideas, and with himself as driver on the front seat, to go rolling slowly over the roads about Honolulu for a few hours at a time. He was passionately fond of song, and modulating cheerfully in his black-eyed girls all about him he would say, "You sings all volly fine song, you know. I give you boys money." Then away the family would go down the road with the girls singing in chorus a medley of all popular songs of the day. It used to be a memorable sight to see bowling along any of the picturesque roads to Honolulu Papa Ah Fong, with his long cue hanging down his back, driving to a stately conveyance containing the complete family circle all singing, laughing and having a noisy good time all by themselves.

The Celestial that he was, Wing Ah Fong never gave up his idea that the Chinese way of living and doing things was a little superior to any other. He let his wife run the home and dress and educate the daughters as she saw fit. The Ah Fong boy, however, was the father's favorite. So while the Ah Fong girls dressed and were modern up according to American ideas, their brother wore a cue, had his head shaved, and wore flowing silken garments like his father. Often his sisters daughters got him to don a black dress suit and go, when a party of naval officers came to the mansion to dine, but the father afterward declared he would never again so forget his race as to appear in other garb than that of a Chinaman. Occasionally, when he had his virgin band of gayly-caparisoned femininity drive down to the Honolulu wharf to give a welcoming hand to the people from the steamer or a man-of-war he would please his daughters by putting his long, shiny cue under his Derby hat.

The Ah Fong home in Honolulu is one of the sights that tourists are taken first to see. It stands in the western suburbs of the city, amid the most beautiful grounds in all the South Seas. There are avenues of palms, winding paths of lava, scores of beds of flowers, numerous fish ponds, a wealth of tropical shrubbery and a pagoda fountains and a half-dozen artistic grottoes. The house itself is a composition of a dozen styles and American architecture predominates. It is an enormous affair, with the odd, cool nooks of piazzas. Evening guests of the marriageable daughters in Honolulu say the Ah Fong parents had their own ideas as to the best place for the piazza built in this fashion, particularly as no such daughter in the family have a chance to be alone with a beau, unless, of course, it be for an evening like the charming one I take it is a fact that all the Ah Fong piazzas—so famous in Honolulu—are close to the hearts of many a naval officer and American young man resident in the islands.

In 1890 Wing Ah Fong was supposed to be worth over $2,000,000. He refused some $50,000 for his holdings on the island of Maui alone. There has always been a mystery about the reason that Mr. Ah Fong left Honolulu and sailed for China at his boyhood home in China in June 1891. He spent months getting his enormous business in shape to leave it, and he sailed away with his family. When months passed and Ah Fong was still unheard from there began to be rumors among the Chinese in Honolulu that the millionaire merchant had been killed in China. When a year went by and he was yet absent the doomed rumors were definitely than ever. Mrs. Ah Fong and her daughters kept closely at home for a long time and never spoke on the subject to outsiders.

The Chinese merchants in Honolulu learned to say that Mr. Ah Fong had suddenly gone on a visit to his former wife and her two sons in Pekin, and that in the days of China he had come very close paying for poison for a long term for keeping his family in China and going to a foreign land. The general belief was that Mr. Ah Fong had got a glimpse of some American or Hawaiian girl and had fallen with a good and fair white woman all the days with the fleshly Chinaman Pang. Naturally the tongues have many of tale to gossip on. But Ah Fong family in Honolulu has never been in the fathers sin that day in July eleven years ago. Every one in Honolulu believes the gossiping story as to the fate that befell Papa Ah Fong is true. Moreover, the Honolulu newspapers for several times published the gossip about Mr. Ah Fong without contradiction.

The hospitality of the Ah Fong mansion has never waned during the years of absence of Mr. Ah Fong. The family business affairs have been kept in fine shape, and the real estate and shipping interests have largely increased in value since the annexation of Hawaii to the United States.

"What do you want, little boy?"

"Is this where Mr. Upjohn lives, ma'am?"

"Yes."

"The Mr. Upjohn that runs the bank?"

"He is an officer in the bank."

"The Mr. Upjohn that went down town on the trolley car this morning?"

"I presume he went on a trolley car. What—"

"Is he the Mr. Upjohn that was in that horrible street car accident?"

"Didn't hear 'at he sprained his ankle jumpin' out of the car when the train run into it?"

"No, little boy, you frighten me. What has—"

"Didn't hear how he run to a drug store for a piece o' court plaster to stick on a little cut he'd got over the eye?"

"Not at all. For mercy's sake—"

"He isn't in, is he, ma'am?"

"No, he's—"

"Name's John U. Upjohn, isn't it?"

"Yes, that's his name."

"Then he's the same man. He won't be here for an hour or two. I guess 'cause he's scoopin' to have one o' his nerves tightened that got knocked a little bit loose when he was jumpin' out o' danger, y' know."

"Little boy, tell me the whole story. I think I can bear it now."

"Well, ma'am, he's in the hospital with four ribs broke an' one leg's in a shock, an' his nose is knocked kind o' sideways; but he's gettin' along all right and he'll be out again in about a month an' here's a letter fm' the doctor, tellin' yer all about it, ma'am."

IT MIGHT BE WORSE.

The girl who loves to giggle
Irritates the passer-by,
But she's infinitely better
Than the girl who loves to cry.

The man who loves to flatter
Off may play a scurvy trick,
But he's infinitely better
Than the man who loves to kick.

And so, throughout existence,
This comfort we may nurse,
There's nothing so unpleasant
But that it might be worse.
