HUGE NAVAL GUNS ASTOUND FRENCH RAILWAY OFFICERS

Monster Pieces Shipped Across Atlantic Despite Warnings That "It Couldn't Be Done."

HUGE PROJECTILES ARE USED

Railway Officials in France Look With Awe Upon Cannon, Saying Would Not Pass Tunnels.

By Newton C. Parke

With the American Army Northwest of Verdun, Oct. 28.—(Night.)—(I. N. S.)—The task of trying to smash the Germans' most important lateral lines of communication with the big guns now thundering behind the American front was nothing compared with the work of bringing the guns up to the firing line.

In the first place the greatest difficulty was encountered in getting the monsters across the Atlantic. Many wiseacres declared that they would take up too much tonnage and that they would prove "white elephants" when they finally arrived.

When the pieces did get here the French railway officials took one look at the giants and then waved their hands in despair. They said that they could not be mounted on any existing railway trucks in France, because the cars were sure to break down.

Had to Show French

The American artillery commander persuaded the French officials to allow him to make a try, but the French were still insistent that the railway would never bear the strain. To prove it was possible the American had one of the great cannon mounted on a railway truck and shunted it up and down the road without mishap.

"But you can never get them through the tunnels," said the French. That was the final objection.

Eventually one gun was rushed through from the coast to the front and this objection was swept away.

Then the monsters were emplaced and began hurling projectiles in the direction of Germany.

The first day of the cannonade the projectiles were let loose with a roar that shook the earth.

So huge were the projectiles that they could be followed with the naked eye as they left the muzzles. They looked like big footballs kicked off by some giant.

Retreating Germans Set Traps

Pains are taken by the retreating Germans in setting devices for the blowing up of dugouts after the Americans enter them.

This is illustrated by a contrivance found at Chatel Chehery. Eight feet from the entrance a cane was found with the crook of the handle resting on a handrail and a small string attached. This string, which was cunningly hidden, led to a point on the roof of the dugout where there was a small chamber containing 25 pounds of lignite covered by rock. It was arranged in such a way that if any man had grasped the cane, the explosive would have been set off and the dugout would have been blown up. Several similar contrivances were found in the same town.

The same yellow-bellied enemy planes which tried to challenge our air supremacy during the smashing of the St. Mihiel salient, have arrived on this front and have reinforced the old Richthofen flying squadron, the crack unit of the German army.
