M'CORMICK SPEECH BLOWS UP IN SENATE

am afraid the number is increasing."

BORAH WANTS TO KNOW

Just after the Senator "Pat" Harrison of Mississippi from the Democratic side, wanted to know whether the administration is going to bring in a resolution to put an American representative on the reparations commission. McCormick dodged that question, too, saying he does not know the purpose of the administration. Everyone else knows that the president wants the United States represented, because of statements authorized at the White House.

"Into that commission we propose to enter," said Senator Borah, "so we are now told, and I submit to my able friend from Illinois now, when the bill or resolution authorizing the president to appoint a member of the reparations commission comes to this body, what will be the position of the Republicans in that fight? What will be our attitude? Does he doubt for a moment what we as a party will do? And the League Democrats will join you, because it is a long step toward that for which they have been contending."

DODGES QUESTION

Senator Borah went on to say that after joining the reparations commission the United States cannot do its duty and carry out its obligations without joining the League of Nations. This will follow "as inevitably as the night follows the day," he said. He recalled that Hughes and Hoover are pro-League Republicans who asked the people to vote for Harding as the best way to get into the League.

"It is no question of party issue," said Borah. "It is a question of individuals. On this question I know no party obligation. The most powerful influences in the administration, outside of the president himself, are in favor of the United States entering the League."

This was a disconcerting finale for McCormick, who had started out to assail Cox and the Democrats for their wickedness in saying that the United States should enter the league. McCormick did not venture to say what his own position will be on joining the reparations commission, or whether that will lead directly to the door of the League.

THOUSANDS STAMPEDE PARK FOR FIRST GAME

seat and wiped perspiration from his face, "I guess my wife got left." And he turned his attention to the infield practice.

No less than 22,000 persons, among them about 2000 opportunists or others who were carried into the park along with the surging throng without having the customary cardboard admission tickets, witnessed the game, not including 200 who perched themselves on building tops as far as a quarter of a mile away. The official count of paid admissions was 20,167.

SOME CROWDED AWAY

A thousand or more who formed lines extending blocks from the ticket windows were disappointed. The windows were closed when more admissions would have meant planting spectators in the pitchers' box or in other positions of decided perturbation to the athletes.

It was a great day for the dignitaries. Mayor Baker took his stand at the home plate, held up his hand for silence and prepared to make a speech, but someone handed him a glove, mask and air bag, to protect his corporation, and in the parlance of the day, he didn't get to first base, oratorically speaking.

Governor Olcott, coatless and vestless and with a borrowed baseball cap, stepped into the pitcher's box after a preliminary warming up, while Viola Dana, fresh from Hollywood, took the batter's position. She could hardly swing the heavy bat, but then things were pretty well evened up, as the governor could hardly throw and the mayor couldn't catch.

BOYS HALT GAME

Of the trio the governor appeared in best form. A trifle muscle bound, nevertheless he pitched with some accuracy and finally truck out the moyle star. The best she did was to hit a foul. The mayor no doubt thought they were playing one old cat, for when the luscious Viola swung futilely on the third strike he picked up the ball—he always had to pick it up—and touched home plate. The trio, with the mayor looking like Babe Ruth might 20 years hence, posed for the fade out before a dozen camera men, while the Elks drum corps touchingly played a drummer boys' interpretation of "Hearts and Flowers."

All the thrills were not in the game.

During the seventh inning an airplane flying overhead dropped, as per schedule, a dozen or so season tickets. All the policemen in the park—and there might have been one or two elsewhere in the city—could not staunch the flow of 200 boys onto the diamond. What was an inning in one game compared with a ticket for the season? A mere nothing in the small boys' thoughts. Police and players finally succeeded in shooing them back to the side lines.

And the opening game of the season continued without further interruption.

RUSSO-GERMAN PACT RESULT OF SECRECY

tested by the universal discontent among the delegates of the smaller powers.

AGREEMENT SIGNED

The final step was taken when the Germans were informed from a little entente and hence probably pro-ally source, of the decision to be taken against them. Then the Germans called on Russia and signed an agreement in which they relinquished nothing but their own property and made provision for a subsequent general agreement. This was a strictly economic agreement without political implications and having no secret clauses.

Sunday morning before signing the Germans endeavored to inform the British, but as it was Easter they could not be reached. The agreement, owing to the insistence of the Russians, took the form of a treaty and was given immediate force to forestall the allies who seemed to be trying to isolate Germany and add to her financial burden under the pretext of aiding Russia.

WILL STAND PAT

The German delegates whom I have seen, including Herr Maltzan, who drew up the treaty, cannot understand the resentment of the allies and indignantly deny having violated the letter of the Cannes conference. They consider that they violated it in spirit only after the allies by their secret meeting with the Russians had previously violated it in spirit.

Such is the German position. The writer believes the Germans will stand by their guns, possibly questioning the justice of the attempt of a mere group of powers to legislate ex-cathedra concerning membership in the committees, the interpretation of documents and in general to dominate what was presumed to be a meeting of sovereign states with equal powers.

Washington, April 19.—(I. N.
