REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER DXVIII

WHAT HAPPENED WHEN DICKY WELCOMED HIS MOTHER AT THE DOOR.

"Where is Katie and Jim?" stormed Dicky. I'll send them to open the door."

"You'll do no such thing," I replied steadily. "I have given Katie orders not to present herself at the door, and you will realize the reason for my order if you think a moment. And Jim is at the barn.

"May I remind you that your mother is probably getting impatient? I imagine she will not consider the welcome she is receiving as a particularly cordial one, especiall considering the months she has been absent from you."

I knew, and was a bit malicious in my pleasure in the knowledge, that Dicky would rave given a good deal for the privilege of soundly boxing my ears. His mother, with a womap companion, a stranger to me, whom Dicky had guessed to be Cousin Agatha, had unexpectedly driven up to the door but a few moments before—one of the "surprises" Mother Graham was so fond of giving her relatives. Indeed, they were frantically ringing the doorbell at the very moment I was insisting that my husband must open the door for them.

Dicky, dusty, dishevelled and, I knew, regretting the obstinacy that had led him to sort his collection of old books and periodicals in the living room, had tried to make me go to the door, wishing to bathe and dress before meeting the coldly critical eyes of his mother and Cousin Agatha. It wasn't alone a desire to punish him for his treatment of me concerning the living room furniture that had kept me from going to the door. I actually dreaded the storm of amazed criticism which would follow my mother-in-law's first view of our upset rooms.

Mother Graham Speaks.

With a muttered anathema which I knew consigned me to a place not generally desirable as a summer residence, Dicky made a futile attempt to shake himself free of dust and to smooth down his rumpled hair and clothing. Then he marched to the door with much the air of a man on his way to the scaffold, unlocked it and threw it open.

"Why, mother!" he exclaimed, and I, lingering behind him, wondered at the amazed delight with which he managed to fill his voice. "Wherever did you drop from? And Cousin Agatha, too. What a delightful surprise. But why didn't you wire us?"

"Don't waste any of that talk on me, Richard," snapped his mother-while Cousin Agatha stood with pursed-up lips, evidently viewing with disapproval the little domestic scene into which she had been ushered. "I haven't quite lost my eyesight yet, and when I got out of that taxicab I distinctly saw Margaret and that jumping-jack of a Katie looking out of the windows. They dodged back but they couldn't fool me. And now I want to know why we were left to cool our heels on your doorstep like tramps until you got good and ready to let us in."

She folded her arms and regarded us with the menacing look of one who is prepared to demand instant satisfaction at the sword's point for real or imaginary wrongs. I saw that Dicky was dazed at her sudden onslaught and that, in vulgar parlance, it was "up to me" if the situation were to be saved.

"Dear mother," I said going up to her and putting my arms around her, although I might as well have tried to embrace a cake of ice in the refrigerator, for any response I received, "it was terribly wrong of me. I know, but I am sure you'll pardon me when you hear my excuse.

A Diplomatic Error.

"I did see you getting out of the taxicab, and I ran to tell Dicky and to warn him to run upstairs and get dressed before he met your guest-whom of course I did not know. You see Dicky has been sorting his books and papers and you can behold for yourselves what a state he has gotten himself into. But when Dicky heard you were here he insisted on coming to the door himself, instead of letting me admit you first, as I wished. And in argument of the matter we inadvertently let you wait at the door longer than we should."

"A very ingenious story, Margaret," said my mother-in-law, frigidly, disengaging her arm from around my waist, "but you forget the very pointed surprise which Richard just expressed at seeing us."
