CHAPTER 614

WHAT MADGE DID WHEN THE PEDDLER FLED FORM WILLIAM.

The Teutonic oath of the pseudo peddler at my kitchen door instead of the jargon he had been using—evidently in the belief that I would accept it is an Italian's broken English—was the final bit of evidence I needed to complete the mosaic of my suspicions concerning the man.

He was the spy who had tried to gain entrance to Lillian's library by sawing through the closet door, the man over whose hand I had poured carbolic acid in a desperate attempt to save the important secret documents Lillian was guarding!

I blessed the psychic impulse which had led me downstairs when Katie announced a poor, begging peddler was at the door, for if I had simply sent him a bit of money I wouldn't have seen the gloved hand which aroused my suspicions of his identity, suspicions wild and fantastic, I had thought, but that now were justified.

How he had traced me in so short a time, how, indeed, he had become aware of my identity were problems unsolvable to me. The bald facts confronted me. He had traced me, he was planning a later burglarious entrance into my house, and he was now escaping as rapidly as his legs would carry him, warned that I had recognized him by my startled exclamation at his betraying oath.

William who had passed on into the kitchen with his load of wood, dropped it and rushed to the door at the sound of the man's flying footsteps.

A Feeble Chance.

"Let me by, Mis' Gramie!," he pleaded, for I blocked the doorway purposely. "I kin ketch him quick, me an' Pete. See Pete jes' waitin' fer me to let him go."

I looked down at the upturned face of Pete, William's nondescript bull terrier. He was looking at his master eagerly, his red-rimmed eyes gleamed, and his punishing jaw protruded fearsomely. There was no doubt that Pete would be glad of the chance to pull down and punish the intruder.

But I was uncertain as to Lillian's desires in the matter. Did she wish the man captured so soon and in a manner which would necessitate his being turned over to the local police, of whose ability to hold so dangerous and versatile a man I had a very poor opinion? I was fairly certain that she didn't. But he must be traced.

I turned and took William by the arm.

"William," I said impressively. "I don't want you to catch that man yet, but I want you and Pete to track him without his seeing you and find out where he lives if possible, and who he is. Here's some money." I hastily took some bills from my purse and thrust them into William's hand. "Follow him to the city or anywhere else he goes, and telephone me when you have found him, or if you need more money. Hurry now, but be careful that he doesn't see you."

It was a feeble chance, I felt, this dependence upon a poor moron such as William is. But I had always noticed a sort of cunning in William that might prove an asset in his mission. At any rate it was the only thing I could do.

"Dot Poor Villum!"

William threw back his shoulders and looked tremendously important as he hurried past me.

"I'll find him for ye, Mis' Gramie!" he promised grandiloquently. "Come, Pete," and the two ran lightly over the grass until they reached the boundary hedge between our grounds and those of the Durkees.

There, holding the dog back, he knelt down, parted the bushes and looked through cautiously. The next minute, evidently finding the coast clear, he straightened himself, waved a reassuring hand to me and disappeared through the hedge.

I turned back into the kitchen to find Katie eyeing me with undisguised curiosity.

"I think that is the same man who tried to break into Mrs. Underwood's house and steal her silver, Katie," I said, realizing the necessity of quieting her curiosity as quickly as I could. "If we turned him over to the police here he would get away. If William can find out who he is the city police can get him."

"Dot poor Villum!" Katie rejoined half-contemptuously, and I realized that she privately thought my explanation a lame one. "If dat peddler ever see heem he keel heem sure."

"I'm sure William will keep out of his way," I replied, and picking up the pencil cases and pencils I wanted from the pseudo peddler's basket, which, fortunately for me, he had left lying on the porch, I directed Katie to put the basket away carefully. I hoped there might be some clue to the man's identity through these tawdry articles which he had purchased.

Then with my pencil cases in hand I mounted the stairs to my room again warned by my watch that the time for Dicky's return was perilously drawing near, and that I as yet had devised no good hiding place for the important paper in my trick wrist watch.
