COMPETITIVE MARKETING UPHELD

the business in which he had been engaged for 25 years prior to the war, and that he "had no ambitions for expansion."

Mr. Barnes described the injection of government into business as "most undesirable and only justified when our producers have been deprived of the usual protection of free competition."

It was certain that Great Britain will dissolve its governmental grain agencies in the near future, he said, after which normal trading judgment, the weighing of influences of supply and demand, would again dominate the grain markets of the world.

Concluding his statement with a plea that "the study of grain exchanges be approached without any preconceived opinions or convictions," Mr. Barnes said he believed that American marketing system was superior to any in the world and that no other method approached it in point of the protection offered the producer and consumer alike. "Speculation does not create fluctuating prices," he declared, "but a fluctuating market attracts speculation, and this in turn, produces a reduced marketing cost."

Domestic Demand Charged.

Questioned as to the earnings of the United States grain corporation, Mr. Barnes said that profits from three years' operations totalled approximately $50,000,000, which amount little more than covered actual interest charges on funds advanced by the United States treasury for operation.

The falling off in domestic demand and not the importation of Canadian wheat was largely responsible for the recent depression of wheat prices, Mr. Barnes declared, saying that during the first four months of the current crop year preceding November 1 the mill consumption of American wheat has been 50,000,000 bushels less than during the same period last year.

"This falling off in mill consumption indicates the temper of our people and the contractions in country demand which that indicates cannot help but have a price effect," he said. "Without the security of hedging insurance, the treasury department will rapidly place in the hands of a few large aggregations of capital, demanding larger tolls as the price of risking their larger aggregate capital in business of such hazards."
