REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by
ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER 749

WHY MADGE'S HEART ALTERNATELY ROSE AND SANK AS THEY TALKED OF MISS HOYT.

"Why, yes, I met Miss Hoyt," I found myself saying mechanically to "the other Mrs. Graham," after I had duly inspected the photograph of her niece.

"Oh, how delightful!" she exclaimed. "Do tell me about it."

"There really is nothing to tell," I returned mendaciously. "Her nurse and mine knew each other very well, and I saw her quite frequently. She is a most charming woman, and how closely she resembles you."

"Do you really think so?" she asked, a pleased inflection in her tone, and I drew a deep breath of satisfaction that the subject had been so successfully skirted.

For if I read Winifred Hoyt's clear, honest eyes aright, no word of my experience in the hospital would reach her aunt through her. She might speak casually of her interesting patient, but of more personal incidents, never. She was of the type of nurse to which my little friend, Katherine Sonnot, belonged, to whom the coincidences, the secrets of her sick rooms were as sacred as if they had been given to a priest.

But I made up my mind that delightful as I imagined a friendship with "the other Mrs. Graham" would be, I should have to avoid it as much as I possibly could. In my present excited state of mind I simply couldn't brook the possibility of meeting Miss Hoyt's clear eyes, with the hint of quiet, disdainful amusement in their depths that I had so often fancied I had seen during the last two weeks.

I had hard work keeping up with my hostess' gentle flow of words concerning her niece, for my own thoughts were so turbulent as to require most of my attention. But the words "American hospital service" caught my ear, and I turned a startled face to my hostess.

"Going To France."

"You will pardon me," I said, "but I do not think I caught just what you were saying. "You know my ears ever since my accident—"

I left the sentence unfinished purposely, salving my conscience with the sophistry that I had not actually said my hearing was temporarily impaired.

"I know," she rejoined sympathetically. "It is often a temporary effect of a nervous shock such as you must have undergone. I was speaking of my niece's joy in her prospect of joining the American hospital service next week.

"She's going to France!" I exclaimed, and I was glad, indeed, to see that my hostess unsuspectingly translated the note of relief in my voice into to enthusiastic expression of interest.

"Yes, she sails next week," the "other Mrs. Graham" replied. "Isn't it wonderful?"

"Indeed it is!" I returned heartily. "I actually envy the women who have the hospital training in these times. They have such boundless opportunities for service. Your niece ought to be especially well adapted to the war work," I added.

In my thankfulness that I was soon to be relieved of the possibility of meeting Miss Hoyt I felt disposed to say everything pleasant concerning her that I could.

"She is," my hostess confirmed my statement with emphasis. "In the first place, she's a wonderful nurse, and in the second place I never saw such discretion as hers. When she leaves the hospital she seems to forget everything connected with it. She rarely mentions even the name of one of her patients, and as for telling me interesting or amusing incidents concerning her work, as so many nurses do, and with no harm either, I don't think I have ever heard her say 50 words about any patient she ever had."

My spirits rose at her words, although I had been practically sure of what she was telling me before she spoke. If Miss Hoyt never spoke of her patients, and was going to sail for France the next week there would be no need of my abridging my acquaintanceship with her charming aunt because of the fear that I might some day encounter the clear eyes of the woman who, I instinctively felt, had looked into chambers of my mind over which I was sure the curtains hadn't been securely drawn.

"I should think she would be glad to forget everything connected with the hospital," I said with a little shiver. "I have the greatest admiration, even envy for a successful nurse, but I am sure I never could be one."

An Unexpected Arrival.

"It requires an unusual combination of qualities," my hostess asserted. "But do let me give you another cup of tea? Yours is quite cold."

"Thank you," I returned, relinquishing my cup to her. "Your tea is too delicious for me to refuse. But I don't deserve another, although it was because I was so interested in what you were saying that I let mine get cold."

"What a delightful compliment!" she smiled, looking into her teapot of quaint Chinese ware. "Do you know, this pot is entirely too large for just two. It's too bad there isn't somebody else here to enjoy these other cups."

A clear tinkling of the doorbell punctuated her sentence.

She smiled as she rose.

"Perhaps my wish has come true," she said as she left the room.

A moment later I heard her voice in the hall:

"Why, Winifred, my dear, how glad and surprised I am! Come right out to the veranda and have a cup of tea. There's some one there you've met before."
