KIMBALL COLLEGE RE-LOCATION AIM

center. In a long conversation with my predecessor, Dr. Talbot, less than two months before his death, he expressed to me his clear judgment that Kimball should be re-located and outlined in detail his plans for the future. This of course, was before I had any expectation of having any relation to the school.

"Every personal consideration would lead me to choose Salem as the permanent location of Kimball but a program of the nature of the Kimball program must be decided upon the basis of Christian statesmanship. While Salem is an ideal location for a college such as Willamette, it is not suited to the professional training of Christian leaders today. The whole trend of modern theological education is toward the large centers and in contact with the great universities. Every theological school in Methodism is either at or immediately contiguous to the greatest city in its patronizing territory. In two instances, namely: in the case of Boston School of Theology and of Macleay School of Theology at Los Angeles, the schools were organized as Kimball has been at a smaller center and later, under stress of circumstances, were moved into the larger centers and into contact with the great universities. Several theological schools in and about Chicago either have carried out or are contemplating removal programs to be in affiliation with great universities. Drew Theological Seminary, just outside of New York, one of the great seminaries of Methodism, offers its students opportunities for post-graduate work in Columbia university and New York university.

"To develop an adequate program Kimball School of Theology must have opportunities for real clinic work, for more adequate student self-support, and for more student pastorates, in addition to opportunities for district post-graduate work. Such opportunities are afforded in the largest measure at Seattle. If the school is established there it will be entirely independent of the University of Washington, although it will be so located in relationship to the campus that Kimball students will have the advantage of graduate work in the university. It is to be noted that the development of Kimball at Seattle will in no sense be in competition with the Methodist colleges, as Kimball will do no academic work but will confine its curriculum exclusively to professional and post-graduate work. Whatever may be the final decision as to the program, the work of the present school year will be carried forward without interruption. If the change is determined upon it will be my expectation that the new program will begin next fall.

"Mrs. Luella D. Kimball, donor of the present Kimball building, and the long-time friend of the institution, has expressed herself as in entire accord with the administration of Kimball in working out a larger program that will better serve the intrests of the northwest and of the church."
